Charter of Bank of United States is law from which it derives all its faculties; it can bring no suit not authorized by law of United States.

Cited in The Commercial Nat. Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, 1 Flipp. 452, 455, Fed. Cas. 3062, holding that suits by national banks are brought under banking act of 1864, and limitations in section 11 of judiciary act do not apply to them; State v. Southern Pacific Co., 23 Or. 431, 31 Pac. 962, holding that petition to remove cause to Federal court, which shows that Southern Pacific Company is corporation organized under State law, does not, on that ground, authorize removal.

Clause in act of incorporation of Bank of United States enabling it to sue in United States courts is valid.

Approved in Bank v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat. 905, 910, 6 L. Ed. 244, 245, as having decided the question of jurisdiction in case where United States Bank brought suit against bank incorporated under State law, stockholders in both banks being citizens of same State; dissenting opinion in Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 551, 19 L. Ed. 488, majority holding Congress could tax notes of any State bank paid out by national bank; Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 135, 23 L. Ed. 838, holding that assignee in bankruptcy might sue in State courts to recover assets of bankrupt; Foss v. First Nat. Bank, 1 McCrary, 476, 3 Fed. 187, and Third Nat. Bank v. Harrison, 3 McCrary, 165, 8 Fed. 723, applying same rule to provisions of Revised Statutes, section 629, as to suits against national banks; First Nat. Bank v. Garlinghouse, 22 Ohio St. 504, 10 Am. Rep. 759, saying that power of Congress to establish national banks must be considered as settled.

Distinguished in Myers v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 3 McCrary, 579, 580, 16 Fed. 293, showing that ruling did not apply to cases of removal from State courts, and that suit to recover damages, caused by defendant's negligence, did not arise under Federal laws.

Limited in Adams Express Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. R. Co., 4 McCrary, 82, 16 Fed. 716, holding that case could not be said to arise under Federal law simply because it was suit by or against corporation organized under Federal statute.

Right of bank of United States to sue in Federal courts rests on its charter, which is law of United States, and independent of question involved.

Approved in Bankers' Trust Co. v. Texas etc. Ry. Co., 241 U. S. 304, 305, 60 L. Ed. 1014, 36 Sup. Ct. 569, denying Federal court's jurisdiction over suit to foreclose mortgage given by railroad organized under Federal law; Shoshone Min. Co. v. Rutter, 177 U. S. 509, 44 L. Ed. 866, 20 Sup. Ct. 727, holding suit on a diverse claim to mine under United States Rev. Stats., §§ 2325, 2326, is not one arising under the laws of the United States; State v. Frost, 113 Wis. 648, 89 N. W. 920, holding Federal court has jurisdiction over suit against corporation formed under United States laws; Petri v. Commercial Bank, 142 U. S. 648, 35 L. Ed. 1145, 12 Sup. Ct. 326, holding national bank may sue citizen of another State in Federal court of defendant's district by reason alone of diverse citizenship; Ex parte Jones, 164 U. S. 692, 41 L. Ed. 601, 17 Sup. Ct. 223, showing that, since act of March 3, 1887, bank's right of suit in Federal courts depended on citizenship alone; The Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Baack, 8 Blatchf. 145, 2 Abb. 241, Fed. Cas. 9052, sustaining right of national bank at Chicago, to sue citizen of New York in Federal court; dissenting opinion in Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 499, 15 L. Ed. 196, majority holding that United States may appear in boundary suit between States without becoming party subject to judgment; Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 462, 467, 28 L. Ed. 487, 489, 4 Sup. Ct. 443, 446, holding validity of Kansas Pacific Railroad Company consolidation, resting on acts of Congress, was triable in Federal court; Hughes v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., 9 Sawy. 321, 18 Fed. 112, holding effect of acts of Congress equivalent to special clause in company's charter, authorizing it to sue and be sued in Federal courts in all cases; United States v. Kendall, 5 Cr. C. C. 251, Fed. Cas. 15,517, jurisdiction of Federal courts in suits concerning patents, United States Bank and postmaster-general could only have been given by Congress as arising under United States laws; Middlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 446, 7 Am. Rep. 458, holding State court had jurisdiction of action on contract, although involving validity of patent.

Distinguished in Pettilon v. Noble, 7 Biss. 453, Fed. Cas. 11,044, holding that it did not follow that because Congress had created bank, therefore it could sue or be sued in Federal courts; Robinson v. National Bank, 81 N. Y. 391, 37 Am. Rep. 518, holding State Supreme Court has jurisdiction of an action ex contractu by citizens of the State against national bank located in another State.

Limited in Cooke v. State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 107, 11 Am. Rep. 673, holding that Federal courts had jurisdiction of suits only when questions of Federal law or Constitution were actually involved.

Banks, whether carried on by a private corporation or an individual, are equally subjects of State taxation.

Approved in United States v. Rickert, 188 U. S. 439, 47 L. Ed. 537, 23 Sup. Ct. 481, holding State cannot tax land allotted to Indians under 24 Stats. at Large, 389, c. 119, providing for the holding of land by the United States in trust for the allottees; Williams v. City of Talladega, 164 Ala. 642, 643, 51 South. 332, holding foreign telegraph company accepting provisions of Federal statute authorizing such companies to operate lines along post-roads was subject to State license tax on intrastate business; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 563, 564, 7 L. Ed. 956, 957, holding that the Providence Bank incorporated by State was subject to State taxation, under subsequent act; Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 607, 18 L. Ed. 902, applying rule to savings societies; Insurance Co. of N. Amer. v. Commonwealth, 87 Pa. St. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 355, holding that State tax on entire business of insurance companies, whether within or without State, was constitutional.

State taxation of Bank of United States.

Approved in Easton v. Iowa, 188 U. S. 229, 47 L. Ed. 456, 23 Sup. Ct. 290, holding Iowa Code, §§ 1884, 1885, prohibiting national banks from receiving deposits when insolvent, and prescribing punishment for its violation, is invalid; Home Title Ins. Co. v. Keith, 230 Fed. 909, holding stamp tax on deeds as applied to deed executed by referee on mortgage foreclosure not void as imposing tax on State's exercise of governmental function; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Texas etc. Ry. Co., 216 Fed. 231, holding interstate railroad incorporated by Federal law was agency of government and not subject to State regulations for foreign corporations; Haeussler v. City of St. Louis, 205 Mo. 686, 103 S. W. 1042, holding Congress had power to authorize city of St. Louis to construct bridge across boundary river; Ford v. Great Falls, 46 Mont. 307, 127 Pac. 1008, holding street assessments could not be levied on Federal property; State v. Thos. Cruse Sav. Bank, 21 Mont. 52, 57, 52 Pac. 734, 736, holding Mont. Pol. Code, § 4061, imposing license on bank, is not in conflict with Const., art. XV, § 11; State v. Texas etc. Ry. Co., 100 Tex. 281, 98 S. W. 834, holding State tax on gross receipts of railroads not enforceable against railroad incorporated under act of Congress; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Lakin, 53 Wash. 334, 17 Ann. Cas. 718, 101 Pac. 1097, holding franchise given by United States to telegraph company to operate on post-roads not subject to State tax; dissenting opinion in South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 452, 466, 50 L. Ed. 266, 271, 26 Sup. Ct. 110, United States may exact revenue license from dispensing agent of State which has taken charge of liquor business; dissenting opinion in Schlesinger v. Gilhooly, 189 N. Y. 30, 12 Ann. Cas. 1138, 81 N. E. 630, majority holding act of Congress limiting interest chargeable by national banks superseded State legislation on that subject; Passenger Cases, 7 How. 538, 12 L. Ed. 809, as an example of an exception to the power of a State to tax all property within its borders; dissenting opinion in Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 591, 18 L. Ed. 237, majority affirming right to tax their shares in the hands of the shareholders; Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 33, 23 L. Ed. 199, arguing that national banks were free from State control, except as allowed by act of Congress, holding that interest on note at rate not lawful by State law, did not bar recovery of principal; People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 543, 25 L. Ed. 706, holding a State could only tax national bank shares under Rev. Stats., § 5219, and a State law was invalid which attempted to impose higher rate; Owensboro Nat. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 667, 43 L. Ed. 852, holding under Rev. Stats., § 5219, States may tax only bank shares and real estate; Second Nat. Bank v. Caldwell, 13 Fed. 433, holding city ordinance imposing license tax on a national bank is invalid; Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Shields, 59 Fed. 954, national bank shares only taxable under Rev. Stats., § 5219; Stapylton v. Thaggard, 91 Fed. 95, holding a State cannot tax a bank chartered by Congress, exempt as to real property; National Com. Bank v. Mayor etc. of Mobile, 62 Ala. 292, 34 Am. Rep. 17, and McHenry v. Downer, 116 Cal. 25, 47 Pac. 780, holding that bank's real estate and shares were liable to State and municipal taxation, but bank, as a bank, could not be taxed; People v. Bradley, 39 Ill. 133, to same effect as to shares in national banks, although funds were invested in government bonds; Wasson v. First Nat. Bank, 107 Ind. 213, 8 N. E. 100, and Bressler v. Wayne Co., 25 Neb. 472, 41 N. W. 357, holding an individual taxpayer may deduct his bona fide debts from assessed value of his shares in national bank, if he have no other money, capital or credits; Bank of Albia v. City Council, 86 Iowa, 37, 52 N. W. 336, on question of taxation of national bank stock, when part of its capital is invested in real estate; Stetson v. City of Bangor, 56 Me. 279, sustaining tax on national bank shares, if levied as and to same extent as on similar property; Commercial Bank etc. v. Nolan, 7 How. (Miss.) 526, holding that rate of interest which bank could charge was governed by State law; State v. Bank, 4 Nev. 352, 353, defining the property of national banks subject to State taxation, and method of taxation provided by Congress; City of Utica v. Churchill, 33 N. Y. 231, sustaining validity of tax on national bank shares in hands of holder, without regard to investment of bank capital in government securities; City of Pittsburg v. First Nat. Bank, 55 Pa. St. 48, holding national banks could only be taxed by State, as provided by act of June, 1864.

Taxation of national banks held invalid in First Nat. Bank v. Fisher, 45 Kan. 728, 26 Pac. 483, as to an assessment of entire stock of a national bank "in solido" against bank itself; Central Nat. Bank v. Pratt, 115 Mass. 546, 15 Am. Rep. 145, holding New York law imposing penalty for taking usury does not apply to national banks within its limits.

By analogy principle has been applied to other than national banks in following cases: Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. 34, 21 L. Ed. 793, sustaining validity of tax on real and personal property of Union Pacific R. R. Co., as distinguished from its franchises; California v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 41, 32 L. Ed. 158, 8 Sup. Ct. 1081, and Central Pac.

R. R. Co. v. California, 162 U. S. 125, 128, 148, 40 L. Ed. 914, 916, 922, 16 Sup. Ct. 778, 780, 787, holding franchises granted by Congress cannot, without its assent, be taxed by State; Sweatt v. Boston, H. & R. R. R. Co., 3 Cliff. 352, 5 N. B. R. 248, Fed. Cas. 13,684, holding railroad corporations were subject to bankruptcy act; San Benito Co. v. S. P. R. R. Co., 77 Cal. 521, 522, 19 Pac. 828, 829, holding county tax on Federal franchise of the company was illegal; North. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Carland, 5 Mont. 187, 3 Pac. 155, holding State could not tax lands given by government as railroad right of way; Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 156, 177, 29 L. Ed. 847, 854, 6 Sup. Ct. 673, 684, holding that United States property is, under Constitution, exempt from State taxation; Luxton v. North R. Bridge, 153 U. S. 529, 38 L. Ed. 810, 14 Sup. Ct. 892, act incorporating North River Bridge Company is constitutional; Day v. Buffington, 3 Cliff. 389, Fed. Cas. 3675, holding salary of judge of court of record is not taxable as income under internal revenue law of Congress; Pullman's Pal. Car Co. v. Twombly, 29 Fed. 663, 664, holding that property is not exempt from taxation, because used for interstate commerce, and that cars used on single run acquire situs for taxation, irrespective of owner's domicile; Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 112, holding franchise of water company is subject to State taxation; New Orleans v. Lea, 14 La. Ann. 194, holding salaries of State judges of supreme and inferior courts are exempt from taxation; Fifield v. Close, 15 Mich. 508, and Jones v. Estate of Keep, 19 Wis. 375, holding internal revenue law requiring process in State courts to be stamped is void; Lenawee Co. Bank v. City of Adrian, 66 Mich. 276, 33 N. W. 306, holding savings bank not liable to State taxation, except for its real estate; People v. Hoffman, 37 N. Y. 15, holding that United States certificates under act of 1st of March, 1862, was subject to State taxation (reversed by Supreme Court, see The Banks v. Mayor, 7 Wall. 16, 19 L. Ed. 57); First Nat. Bank v. Lamb, 50 N. Y. 105, 10 Am. Rep. 446, holding national banks were amenable to State usury laws; First Nat. Bank v. Garlinghouse, 22 Ohio St. 505, 10 Am. Rep. 760, holding that discounting note at usurious rate of interest does not avoid note except as to interest; Commonwealth v. Westinghouse Mfg. Co., 151 Pa. St. 271, 24 Atl. 1110, holding a corporation cannot be taxed by State on its capital invested in patents; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Cited generally in dissenting opinion in Railroad Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. 42, 47, 21 L. Ed. 794, 797, arguing that government corporation whose property is wholly in United States territory could not be subjected to taxation by State subsequently carved out of such territory; Legal Tender Cases, 110 U. S. 445, 28 L. Ed. 213, 4 Sup. Ct. 128, Congress had power to issue obligations of United States; Talbott v. Silver Bow Co., 139 U. S. 440, 35 L. Ed. 210, 11 Sup. Ct. 595, holding that under Rev. Stats., § 5219, States and territories had same power of taxing national banks; dissenting opinion in Leavenworth Co. v. Miller, 7 Kan. 522, 12 Am. Rep. 451, and State v. Nemaha Co., 7 Kan. 560, majority holding legislatures may authorize counties to subscribe for stock in railroads and issue bonds in payment; dissenting opinion in Metropolitan Bank v. Van Dyck, 27 N. Y. 537, majority holding the legal tender act was constitutional.

Distinguished in People v. Brady, 271 Ill. 107, 110 N. E. 867, holding void provisions of Federal reserve act of 1913 for grant to national banks of right to act as trustee, executor, etc., as such functions belong exclusively to States; Union Pac. Co. v. Lincoln Co., 1 Dill. 320, Fed. Cas. 14,378, holding railroad not exempt from State taxation, though chartered and aided by Congress; De Witt v. Hays, 2 Cal. 469, 56 Am. Dec. 354, held not applicable when tax could be satisfied aliunde; People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 43 Cal. 427, holding that subsequent adoption by Federal government of corporation created by State would not exempt it from State revenue laws, and in no case was corporation's real property exempt; People v. App. 770, bonds of District of Columbia, as to any taxation, Federal, State or municipal; Williams v. Creswell, 51 Miss. 822, as to District of Columbia, Congress has exclusive power of legislation; dissenting opinion in Coite v. Society for Savings, 32 Conn. 191, majority holding a State tax on savings banks equal to a per centum on total of deposits was a tax on the corporation, not on its property; Fagan v. City of Chicago, 84 Ill. 233, as to United States custom-house and taxation for public improvements; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Carland, 5 Mont. 176, 3 Pac. 149, as to right of way of railroads chartered by government and State taxation; Barker v. Bank, 59 N. H. 311, as to national banks and State law of usury; Andrews v. Auditor, 28 Gratt. 121, as to United States buildings for workmen employed on government buildings and State taxation.

Limited in State v. Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 387, as not intended to apply to persons or property remaining within jurisdiction of State and protected by its laws and government.

Right to sue cannot depend on defense the defendant may elect to set up.

Approved in Filhiol v. Torney, 194 U. S. 360, 48 L. Ed. 1017, 24 Sup. Ct. 698, averments in complaint in ejectment that defendant's possession rests upon infraction by United States of treaty, and upon a taking of private property without compensation, do not give Circuit Court jurisdiction where averments respecting plaintiff's title do not show case within Federal jurisdiction; Boyd v. Great Western Coal & Coke Co., 189 Fed. 122, 123, holding case not removable to Federal court when defense set up Federal question appearing only from facts alleged in petition for removal; Huff v. Union Nat. Bank, 173 Fed. 336, holding existence of Federal question appeared in complaint; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Wright, 166 Fed. 157, holding bill to enjoin collection of tax by State on personal property having situs in another State for purposes of taxation showed Federal question involved; People's United States Bank v. Goodwin, 160 Fed. 730, holding pleadings of plaintiff anticipating defense involving Federal question did not confer jurisdiction on Federal court; Pittsburg etc. Ry. Co. v. Mitchell, 175 Ind. 203, 91 N. E. 738, holding where complaint declared on State statute, State court had jurisdiction, though answer set up defense under Interstate Commerce Act; Robison

v. Fishback, 175 Ind. 136, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1271, 93 N. E. 668, holding State courts had jurisdiction of suit between city officers and city to determine right to patentable card index system, since complaint did not set up right under patent laws as ground for recovery; Cooke v. Avery, 147 U. S. 385, 37 L. Ed. 212, 13 Sup. Ct. 344, holding defendant who, on first trial, relies for defense on a Federal question, cannot subsequently claim no such question is in controversy; Tennessee v. Union etc. Bank, 152 U. S. 459, 38 L. Ed. 513, 14 Sup. Ct. 656, holding that plaintiff's statement of his own claim must show the case arises under Federal Constitution or laws in order to give jurisdiction to Federal courts, original or by removal; Sawyer v. Parish of Concordia, 4 Wood, 277, 12 Fed. 758, holding that if jurisdiction is shown on face of petition, it cannot be taken away by defense set up; Dowell v. Griswold, 5 Sawy. 43, Fed. Cas. 4041, holding that, irrespective of citizenship, Federal courts cannot take jurisdiction unless plaintiff's right arises out of a United States law; St. Paul etc. R. R. Co. v. St. Paul & N. P. R. R. Co., 68 Fed. 10, 32 U. S. App. 372, holding a reference in complaint to a Federal statute will not give jurisdiction when case, in fact, depends on local or Federal law; Florida etc. R. R. Co. v. Bell, 87 Fed. 374, motion to file additional pleas intended to affect the jurisdiction rightly denied; Grand Gulf Bank v. Archer, 8 Smedes & M. 195, dissenting opinion, arguing the bank had no right of suit on a usurious illegal contract.

In general, one defendant's answer cannot be evidence against another; contra, when one defendant succeeds to another.

Approved in Moore v. Hubbard, 4 Ala. 192, in partition suit excluding answer of two defendants, former partners of plaintiff, to prove purchase of their interests as against other defendants; Julian v. Reynolds, 8 Ala. 684, excluding answer offered in evidence when confession would be with respect to others "res inter alios"; Whiting v. Beebee, 12 Ark. 563, 564, holding purchaser pendente lite could not assert his acquired title to prejudice of rights of the litigants.

In following cases it was shown that exception to rule was too narrow: McKinn v. Thompson, 1 Bland, 160, it was shown it did not embrace case where supplemental answer sought to be put in made no reference to and did not admit anything in answer sought to be read in aid by another defendant; Jones v. Magill, 1 Bland, 198, holding answer of a guardian as to loan, secured by note, would bind ward; Luigan v. Henderson, 1 Bland, 267, discussing exceptions to rule; Fitch v. Stamps, 6 How. (Miss.) 496, where answer of defendant was admitted as evidence against co-defendant claiming as his assignee; Balchen v. Crawford, 1 Sand. Ch. 383, holding that in an interpleader suit answers were, in fact, proofs for deciding title; dissenting opinion in Tilton v. Corfield, 2 Colo. 409, majority holding purchaser pendente lite not bound by amended proceedings after purchase increasing the liens.

Modified in Blakeney v. Ferguson, 14 Ark. 654, 655, 656, 657, 659, 664, specifying cases in which answer of a codefendant might be read.

Distinguished in Dick v. Hamilton, Deady, 328, Fed. Cas. 3890, holding that default of two defendants could not be used as admission of the facts against third defendant; De France v. Howard, 4 Iowa, 529, holding pleadings of alleged fraudulent grantor, in another action, not competent to show fraud against grantee; Jones v. Hardesty, 10 Gill & J. 415, 32 Am. Dec. 185, and Winn v. Albert, 2 Md. Ch. 176, excluding answer of trustee as against cestui que trust, after the former had assigned all his interest in chose in action sued on; Christie v. Bishop, 1 Barb. Ch. 116, 117, 118, 121, stating correct rule as to admission of separate answer of one defendant as evidence against codefendant.

Denied but apparently misunderstood in Glenn v. Baker, 1 Md. Ch. 77, as not rule in Maryland.

Appearance in cause of attorney is presumptive evidence of his authority. Record need not show authority.

Approved in Underfeed Stoker Co. v. American Ship Windlass Co., 165 Fed. 67, and Aaron v. United States, 155 Fed. 836, 84 C. C. A. 67, both following rule; Hatfield v. King, 131 Fed. 794, applying rule in contempt proceeding against attorneys who colluded in representing parties in feigned suit; In re Gasser, 104 Fed. 538, holding under bankruptcy act of 1898, subd. 9, § 1, attorney admitted to practice in United States District Court will be presumed to have authority to appear for creditor he assumes to represent; Rutledge v. Waldo, 94 Fed. 265, holding in defense of action to revive suit which abated by death of complainant, defendant may show attorney who represented them had no authority; Mason v. Intercolonial Ry., 197 Mass. 350, 125 Am. St. Rep. 371, 14 Ann. Cas. 574, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 276, 83 N. E. 876, holding attorney could appear as volunteer on behalf of party not appearing and suggest dismissal as to such party; Munhall v. Mitchell, 178 Mo. App. 499, 163 S. W. 913, holding where authority of attorney was challenged and he failed to produce evidence of authority, court properly found against him; Seattle v. McDonald, 26 Wash. 106, 66 Pac. 147, holding in an action by city, devisee in a will, an allegation that its counsel was authorized to commence suit is unnecessary; dissenting opinion in Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 46 W. Va. 599, 33 S. E. 345, majority holding summons upon president of defendant corporation who is attorney for plaintiff is not void, yet voidable, on proper exception; Washington v. Young, 10 Wheat. 409, 6 L. Ed. 353, when suit is not ordered dismissed, consent will be presumed after verdict; Ritchie v. McMullen, 159 U. S. 241, 40 L. Ed. 135, 16 Sup. Ct. 173, where answer admits entry of appearance with no allegation of lack of authority; Penobscot Boom Co. v. Lamson, 16 Me. 229, 33 Am. Dec. 658, statement of admitted attorney that he represents person or body corporate is sufficient; Farmers' & M. Bk. v. Troy etc. Bk., 1 Doug. (Mich.) 464, indorsement of attorney on declaration; Leavitt v. Wallace, 12 N. H. 492, appearance by an attorney after party has been duly summoned.

The following cases deal with method in which attorneys may be engaged: Davis v. Memphis City R. R. Co., 22 Fed. 886, holding a company's president can employ an attorney without any contract under seal or formal action of directory; Vance v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Blackf. 80, and State Bank v. Bell, 5 Blackf. 128, holding declaration of plaintiff corporation need not aver appointment of their attorney under corporate seal.

The extent of the attorney's authority is shown in the following: Curry v. Bank of Mobile, 8 Port. 374, that attorney for bank may give statutory notice to bank debtor previous to motion for judgment; Harshey v. Blackmarr, 20 Iowa, 171, 89 Am. Dec. 522, defining settled rule as to power to admit service; Jenney v. Delesdernier, 20 Me. 188, he may approve receipt for personal property taken by attaching officer, relieving him from his obligation to retain and produce it; Coler v. Board of Co. Commrs., 6 N. M. 116, 118, 27 Pac. 624, 625, he may stipulate for amendment of pleadings; Attorney General v. Guard. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 275, holding that voluntary appearance by corporation's attorney dispenses with actual service of process.

Cited and relied on as to manner in which an attorney's authority should be questioned, in Bonnifield v. Thorp, 71 Fed. 927, holding burden of proving no authority is on party attacking it, and it must be positive; Tally v. Reynolds, 1 Ark. 103, 31 Am. Dec. 739, holding that before judgment party may, on showing by affidavit sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, require attorney to prove his authority; Price v. Ward, 25 N. J. L. 229, holding weight of authority was in favor of allowing authority to be disputed.

The rule has also been applied to cases of agents other than attorneys in the following cases: Savings Bank v. Davis, 8 Conn. 202, appointment of an agent or attorney to convey real estate of bank may be made by resolution of board without corporate seal; Stamford Bank v. Benedict, 15 Conn. 445, bank cashier may apply money received from debtor in specific manner without authority of corporate vote; Garrison v. Combs, 7 J. J. Marsh. 85, 22 Am. Dec. 121, holding assignment of note by admitted agent of corporation valid without corporate seal; Quarrier v. Peabody Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 518, a corporation may appear in plea to jurisdiction by its president, instead of in person or by its attorney.

Limited in Adams v. Bradley, 5 Sawy. 222, Fed. Cas. 48, holding voluntary appearance of State attorney to contest case would not confer jurisdiction.

Distinguished in Sperry v. Reynolds, 65 N. Y. 184, as not applicable to an appearance in a Justice's Court, where authority of the agent appearing must appear of record.

REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1825.

1*] [*Constitutional Law. Practice.]

WAYMAN et al.
SOUTHARD et al.

Congress has, by the constitution, exclusive authority to regulate the proceedings in the courts of the United States; and the states have no authority to control those proceedings, except so far as the state process acts are adopted by Congress, or by the courts of the United States under the authority of Congress.

The proceedings on executions, and other process, in the courts of the United States, in suits at common law, are to be the same in each state, respectively, as were used in the Supreme Court of the state in September, 1789, subject to such alterations and additions as the said courts of the United States may make, or as the Supreme Court of the United States shall prescribe by rule to the other courts.

A state law regulating executions, enacted subsequent to September, 1789, is not applicable to executions issuing on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States, unless expressly adopted by the regulations and rules of those courts.

The 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, which provides, "that the laws of the several states, except," etc., "shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," does not apply to the process and practice of the courts.

2*] It is a mere legislative recognition *of the principles of universal jurisprudence, as to the operation of the lex loci.

The statutes of Kentucky concerning executions, which require the plaintiff to indorse on the execution that bank notes of the Bank of Kentucky, or notes of the bank of the commonwealth of Kentucky will be received in payment, and, on his refusal, authorize the defendant to give a replevin bond for the debt, payable in two years, are not applicable to executions issuing on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States.

The case of Palmer v. Allen, 7 Cranch, 550, reviewed and reconciled with the present decision.

THIS cause was certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, upon a certificate of a division of opinion between the judges of that court, on several motions, which occurred on a motion made by the plaintiffs to quash the marshal's return on an execution issued on a judgment obtained in that court, and also to quash the replevin bond taken on the said execution, for the following causes:

1. Because the marshal, in taking the replevin bond, and making said return, has proceeded under the statutes of Kentucky, in relation to executions; which statutes are not applicable to executions issuing on judgments in this court, but the marshal is to proceed with such executions according to the rules of the common law, as modified by acts of Congress, and the rules of this court, and of the Supreme Court of the United States.

2. That if the statutes of Kentucky, in relation to executions, are binding on this court, viz., the statute which requires the plaintiff to indorse on the execution, that bank notes of the Bank of Kentucky, or notes of the bank of the commonwealth *of Kentucky, will be re- [*3 ceived in payment, or that the defendant may replevy the debt for two years, are in violation of the constitution of the United States, and of the state of Kentucky, and void.

3. That all the statutes of Kentucky which authorize a defendant to give a replevin bond in satisfaction of a judgment or execution, are unconstitutional and void.

4. Because there is no law obligatory on the said marshal, which authorized or justified him in taking the said replevin bond, or in making the said return on the said execution.

The court below being divided in opinion on the points stated in the motion, at the request of the plaintiffs, the same were ordered to be certified to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Cheves and Mr. Sergeant for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Bibb and Mr. Monroe for the defendants, at the last term.

On the part of the plaintiffs it was insisted, that the executions issued by the courts of the United States for the District of Kentucky, are to be regulated and governed by the laws of the United States, and not by the laws of the state of Kentucky.

It was not necessary to analyze the provisions of the state laws, because the questions that would arise were of a general nature, and rendered any such statement unnecessary. These questions were,

1. Whether, by the constitution of the United *States, Congress has the power to regu- [*4 late the proceedings of the federal courts.

2. Whether Congress has regulated those proceedings, and in what manner.

1. That Congress has the power, was too plain to admit of a doubt. If they have not, they have no power at all, and the whole of that interesting portion of the constitution is inoperative. The clause in question is the third article of the constitution, which establishes and regulates the judicial power. It is a simple text, but it is a very comprehensive one, or it is nothing. It does nothing more, in terms,

SOUTHARD et al.

Congress has, by the constitution, exclusive authority to regulate the proceedings in the courts of the United States; and the states have no authority to control those proceedings, except so far as the state process acts are adopted by Congress, or by the courts of the United States under the authority of Congress.

The proceedings on executions, and other process, in the courts of the United States, in suits at common law, are to be the same in each state, respectively, as were used in the Supreme Court of the state in September, 1789, subject to such alterations and additions as the said courts of the United States may make, or as the Supreme Court of the United States shall prescribe by rule to the other courts.

A state law regulating executions, enacted subsequent to September, 1789, is not applicable to executions issuing on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States, unless expressly adopted by the regulations and rules of those courts.

The 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, which provides, "that the laws of the several states, except," etc., "shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," does not apply to the process and practice of the courts.

2*] It is a mere legislative recognition *of the principles of universal jurisprudence, as to the operation of the lex loci.

The statutes of Kentucky concerning executions, which require the plaintiff to indorse on the execution that bank notes of the Bank of Kentucky, or notes of the bank of the commonwealth of Kentucky will be received in payment, and, on his refusal, authorize the defendant to give a replevin bond for the debt, payable in two years, are not applicable to executions issuing on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States.

The case of Palmer v. Allen, 7 Cranch, 550, reviewed and reconciled with the present decision.

THIS cause was certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, upon a certificate of a division of opinion between the judges of that court, on several motions, which occurred on a motion made by the plaintiffs to quash the marshal's return on an execution issued on a judgment obtained in that court, and also to quash the replevin bond taken on the said execution, for the following causes:

1. Because the marshal, in taking the replevin bond, and making said return, has proceeded under the statutes of Kentucky, in relation to executions; which statutes are not applicable to executions issuing on judgments in this court, but the marshal is to proceed with such executions according to the rules of the common law, as modified by acts of Congress, and the rules of this court, and of the Supreme Court of the United States.

2. That if the statutes of Kentucky, in relation to executions, are binding on this court, viz., the statute which requires the plaintiff to indorse on the execution, that bank notes of the Bank of Kentucky, or notes of the bank of the commonwealth *of Kentucky, will be re- [*3 ceived in payment, or that the defendant may replevy the debt for two years, are in violation of the constitution of the United States, and of the state of Kentucky, and void.

3. That all the statutes of Kentucky which authorize a defendant to give a replevin bond in satisfaction of a judgment or execution, are unconstitutional and void.

4. Because there is no law obligatory on the said marshal, which authorized or justified him in taking the said replevin bond, or in making the said return on the said execution.

The court below being divided in opinion on the points stated in the motion, at the request of the plaintiffs, the same were ordered to be certified to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Cheves and Mr. Sergeant for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Bibb and Mr. Monroe for the defendants, at the last term.

On the part of the plaintiffs it was insisted, that the executions issued by the courts of the United States for the District of Kentucky, are to be regulated and governed by the laws of the United States, and not by the laws of the state of Kentucky.

It was not necessary to analyze the provisions of the state laws, because the questions that would arise were of a general nature, and rendered any such statement unnecessary. These questions were,

1. Whether, by the constitution of the United *States, Congress has the power to regu- [*4 late the proceedings of the federal courts.

2. Whether Congress has regulated those proceedings, and in what manner.

1. That Congress has the power, was too plain to admit of a doubt. If they have not, they have no power at all, and the whole of that interesting portion of the constitution is inoperative. The clause in question is the third article of the constitution, which establishes and regulates the judicial power. It is a simple text, but it is a very comprehensive one, or it is nothing. It does nothing more, in terms, than autl.orize Congress to establish courts, and declare the cases over which they shall have jurisdiction. The grounds of decision are, of course, comprehended. They are to be according to the law of the case. The means for arriving at the decision, or for giving it effect, are not expressly provided. But as the means are indispensable to the attainment of the end, which is the administration of justice, they are necessarily included in the grant; and the power to provide them is, of course, implied in the power to establish judicial tribunals. A court is a place where justice is judicially administered.[1] To say merely that courts should be established, would be entirely idle. To say, therefore, that courts shall be established, means that all the needful and usual incidents to courts shall be established.

This proposition was so completely self-evi-5*] dent *as not to admit of any support from argument or illustration, nor to require any aid from the clause in the first article, giving Congress power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the other power expressly granted, or vested in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. That it was so understood, is plain from the fifth, sixth and seventh articles of the original amendments, which are limitations of the generality of a power otherwise unlimited.

That it was not the design of the constitution finally and irrevocably to adopt any existing system of state legislation as to process, by reference thereto, is quite certain, because there is no such reference. It could not refer by implication to the means employed in the state courts, because they were many, and no one could say which was referred to. It would have been unwise, because it would have made the system invariable, and capable of no amendment. It could not have meant to refer to the varying forms adopted by the state courts, for it was impossible to anticipate how they would be distributed; these are subjects of jurisdiction, for which the state institutions could afford no example, because they had no such tribunals, the jurisdiction being exclusive; and it would have made the existence of the national judiciary dependent upon state legislation.

It must, therefore, be taken for granted, that the power of Congress in arranging the federal judicial tribunals, and the means to be employ-6*] ed *by them for effectuating the design of their establishment, was plenary, and subject to no exceptions but those which the constitutions itself has made. The acts of Congress to be referred to, would show that this had been the uniform understanding. Nor is the power of Congress on this subject greater in cases where the United States are a party, than in other cases, where the controversy is between individuals.

2. The next question was, what had been done by Congress.

The act of the 24th of September, 1789, c. 20, established the judicial tribunals. The 34th section enacts, that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." But this merely gives the ground of decision; it does not give the means of attaining the decision, or of giving it effect.

The powers of the courts are conferred by the sections from 13 to 17 inclusive. The courts being thus established, their jurisdiction defined, or to be defined, and the nature of their proceedings distinguished, the power to issue the common law writs of mandamus and prohibition, is vested in the Supreme Court by the latter part of the 13th section. The 14th section, then, gives them power to issue "writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for *the exercise of their [*7 respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law." This is to be taken ad referendum, according to the function they were to perform. They were to be common law courts, proceeding according to the course of the common law, with power to issue writs agreeably to the principles and usages of that law. The common law remedies were therefore adopted by the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, and it has been judicially determined that these remedies are to be not according to the varying practice of the state courts, but according to the principles of the common law, as settled in England.[2] This, of course, is to be understood with the exception of such modifications as have been made by acts of Congress, the rules of court made under those acts, and the state laws in force in 1789.

The 18th section, considering that there would be an immediate right of execution by the previous provisions, gave a limited stay. There are further provisions to the same effect in the 23d, 24th and 25th sections. There are various other provisions, but the result is, in all but the excepted cases, to give an immediate right of execution, or after a limited delay.

This act was followed immediately by the process act of the 29th of September, 1789, c. 21. The second section enacts, "that the forms of writs, except their style, and modes of process," etc., "in the circuit and district courts, in suits *at common law, shall be the same [*8 in each state respectively as are now used or allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same." The act was limited to the end of the next session. It was continued by an act of the 26th of May, 1790; and, by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.), its provisions were made permanent.

Whether these acts, in their terms, are to be understood as embracing the forms of process only, or also as describing the effect, was not, perhaps, very material to inquire. The words, understood in their natural sense, comprehend the whole. The proviso as to executions, shows that they were so understood. But it is entirely certain, that by the conjoint operation of the judiciary act, and the process act, the means to be used in the administration of justice, as to their nature, form and effect, were fixed upon a permanent basis; subject to alteration by no other legislative power than that of Congress, and by the power given to the courts of the United States in the second section of the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.). With the exception of changes since made by Congress, and by the court, the remedies now to be used are the same as were used in September, 1789. Whoever would know what are the remedies in a given case, must inquire what they were in the particular state at that time. And these remedies are of exactly the same efficacy, and have the same power and operation now as then. Anything short of this would be inadequate to the end to be accomplished. The 9*] process is nothing *but for the effect. The court is nothing without its process.' To leave this dependent upon state legislation, would be to leave the administration of justice in the federal courts at the mercy of the states. Congress has made many changes, and many more are wanting. The courts of the United States have made rules for regulating the practice. But in no case have changes in any of these particulars been introduced into the courts of the Union, either by the legislation of the states, or the rules of the state courts.

But, independent of these general considerations, the question has been repeatedly subjected to judicial determination both in the circuit courts and in this court. Thus, in The United States v. Worson,[1] it was held, that the provision in the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, making the state laws rules of decision in the courts of the Union, did not apply to the process and practice of the federal courts. In Campbell v. Robinson,[2] this court held that the remedies in the courts of the United States, both at common law and in equity, are to be, not according to the fluctuating practice of the state courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of those princi- 10*] ples. The case of Palmer *v. Allen[3] also confirms the principle for which the plaintiffs insisted.

The value of the process of execution depends upon the time when it may be had, and the manner in which it may be executed, and the subjects upon which it may be levied. If it should be asked, whether a state may not withdraw certain kinds of property from execution, the answer would be, that this was not the question here, and it was not necessary to go out of the case. If the power to establish a judiciary necessarily include the power to confer upon it the authority to use the needful remedies, it must certainly be allowed that the states cannot hinder and destroy the process of execution. Such a right is wholly incompatible with the power of the Union in Congress assembled. If it may withhold one process, it may withhold all. If it can modify, i. e., impair, or weaken, the efficacy of the process, the consequence is the same. The courts would be then left with the power to adjudicate, but without the power to enforce their decisions. But here the property sought to be reached is subject to execution by the laws of the state; and where the end is permitted, the means of attaining it must be left free.

It was also insisted, that the statutes of Kentucky in question were repugnant to the constitution of the United States, as impairing the obligation of contracts, and as being tender laws. But as the court intimated that the cause might *be upon the other points, [*11 the argument upon the constitutionality of the act was not pressed.

On the part of the defendants it was insisted,

1. That Congress has no power, under the constitution, to enact an execution law, governing the substance of the proceedings on execution from the federal courts, in suits between private individuals.

2. That, supposing Congress to possess such a power, it could not delegate its authority to the Supreme and other courts of the United States.

3. That the acts of Congress applicable to this subject, do not attempt to delegate that authority to the courts of the Union.

4. That congress has not attempted to establish a uniform execution law throughout the United States, nor adopted the laws of the states in force at any particular period, but left the process of execution to be regulated from time to time by the local state laws.

In support of the first point, a distinction was drawn betweeen cases arising from the character of the parties, such as citizens of different states, aliens, etc., and cases arising from the nature of the controversy, as involving the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, and over which the federal courts had either an original or appellate jurisdiction. The first class of cases arose either under foreign or municipal law, which must be applied as the rule of decision. The remedy followed as a part of the local law of the state where the suit was brought. It was not necessary for Congress to exercise any legislative *power over this class of cases, as it was [12 over the other, depending upon the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union. The grant of judicial power was here more extensive than the legislative. It was not necessary that Congress should have the power of establishing a civil code for the decision of this class of cases. Neither was it necessary that Congress should regulate the substance of the remedies, which might safely be left to the state legislatures, so long as they made no laws prohibited by the constitution respecting contracts. The power delegated in the third article of the constitution was exclusively judicial, and, therefore, Congress, whose powers are legislative only, are necessarily excluded. The power given to Congress in the first article "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," does not include the power of regulating the remedies as to this class of cases. In making these regulations, Congress must either have the power to authorize the selling of all property under the process of the federal courts, or it is restricted to such as the state legislatures think fit to subject to execution. If the former, the power includes an extensive control over the civil legislation of the states as to property and contracts, which the constitution never contemplated. If the latter, it is an illusory power, since, if the states may exempt from, or subject to, execution, in their discretion, they may also regulate the manner of levying it in all other respects. As to the power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the 13] other powers, etc., it applied *only to those conferred for national purposes, and not to mere judicial power, which must be exercised according to the municipal law applicable to the case. Congress had so determined, in the 34th section of the judiciary act, by which the state laws were made "rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." They do apply in the decision of all controversies between citizens of different states, or between aliens and citizens.

2. In support of the second point, that Congress could not delegate its authority of regulating process (whatever might be the extent of it) to the courts of the Union, it was argued, that by the general principles of all free and limited government, as well as the particular provisions of the federal constitution, the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, are vested in separate bodies of magistracy. All the legislative power is vested exclusively in Congress. Supposing Congress to have power, under the clause, for making all laws necessary and proper, etc., to make laws for executing the judicial power of the Union, it cannot delegate such power to the judiciary. The rules by which the citizen shall be deprived of his liberty or property, to enforce a judicial sentence, ought to be prescribed and known; and the power to prescribe such rules belongs exclusively to the legislative department. Congress could not delegate this power to the judiciary, or to any other department of the government. The right to liberty and prop- 14*] erty is a *sacred vested right under the constitution and laws of the Union and States. The regulations by which it is to be devested, for the purpose of enforcing the performance of contracts, are of vital importance to the citizen. The power of making such regulations is exclusively vested in the legislative department, by all our constitutions, and by the general spirit and principles of all free government. It is the office of the legislator to prescribe the rule, and of the judge to apply it; and it is immaterial whether it respects the right in controversy, or the remedy by which it is to be enforced. The mere forms and style of writs, and other process, may, indeed, be regulated by the courts, but the regulation of the substantive part of the remedy belongs to the legislature. The power to establish courts, with the jurisdiction defined by the constitution, does not involve, by necessary implication, the authority of delegating any portion or incident of that power to the courts themselves. That authority is not expressly given; consequently it does not exist.

3. Congress has not, in fact, delegated this authority to the court. The several process acts passed by Congress, regulate the forms only; they give to the courts the power to regulate the forms only. The expressions in the 2d section of the act of 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.), "subject, however, to such alterations as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the Unit- 15*] ed States shall think proper, *from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court," apply only to "the forms of writs, executions and other process, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits."

Every court has, like every other public political body the power necessary and proper to provide for the orderly conduct of its business. This may be compared to the separate power which each house of Congress has to determine the rules of its proceedings, and to punish contempts. This is altogether different from the general legislative power, which Congress cannot delegate, and never has attempted to delegate, to either house, separately, or to the executive and judicial departments of the government. To construe the power to regulate the forms of process and modes of proceeding, into a power in the courts to make execution laws, would be to suppose Congress intended to violate the constitution, by delegating their legislative power to the judiciary. The laws of the states on the subject of executions are various and contradictory. Did Congress mean to give to this court the power to make a uniform execution law throughout the Union, or to adopt the common law of England, and thus to repeal the statutes of all the states regulating what shall, and what shall not, be subject to execution? The forms of process are distinct from the rights and duties to be observed in their execution. The usual form of a fi. fa. is a mandate to the marshal to make the money of the goods and chattels of the defendant; *but what property may [*16 or may not be levied, and how, and when, and where it is to be sold, and whether the same is subject to redemption by the debtor, are all of the substance of the remedy.

4. In support of the position that Congress intended to leave the process of execution to be regulated from time to time by the state laws, it was argued, that the process act of 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.), omits the words contained in the 2d section of the process act of 1789, c. 21, "and modes of process," used after the words, "forms of writs and executions," etc. The expressions which seem to occupy, in the act of 1792, the place of these omitted words, are the following: "And modes of proceeding in suits," which are too unequivocal to require comment. "Modes of proceeding in suits," made use of in connection with the preceding words, "writs, executions," etc., plainly refer to those acts in court which relate to the determination of the controversy, in opposition and contradistinction to the forms of the mesne process, and also of the process of execution by which the judgment is enforced after the termination of the suit. Proceedings after judgment are always distinguished by law writers, both from the mesne process, and from the proceedings in the suit.[1] There is a plain difference between the forms of writs, and their effects, with the powers and duties conferred under them; between the modes *of proceeding in suits, and the laws of [*17 execution to enforce the judgment. The only clause in the process act of 1789, c. 21, which favored the notion that it was the intention of Congress to prescribe the effect of any writ of execution, had been omitted in the process act of 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.). The concluding paragraph in the 2d section of the act of 1789,

c. 21, "and be at liberty to pursue the same, until a tender of the debt and costs in gold and silver shall be made," was entirely omitted in the subsequent act. And the circumstance of this act having been confined in its duration to one year, and that at the two succeeding sessions it had been continued for the same term only, and when the permanent act was passed, this clause, as well as the indefinite expression, "modes of process," were both excluded, showed that they were purposely excluded, so that no effect should be given to writs of execution, other than what they would receive from the local laws of the states.

The provision in the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, making the state laws rules of decision in cases where they apply, furnishes the rules by which this case is to be determined. The question is, whether the marshal has conducted himself according to law in executing this process. The mere form of the writ is insufficient to determine it. If you apply the state execution laws as existing in 1789, or 1792, nearly all the western states will be left without an execution law applicable in the federal courts, since they were 18*] admitted into the *Union subsequent to the enactment of the process acts.

Congress has itself given a legislative exposition of the acts now in question, evidently considering the execution laws of the states to be the laws of execution for the federal courts. By the judiciary act of 1793, c. 167 (XXII.), s. 3, it is provided, "that where it is now required by the laws of any state, that goods taken in execution on a writ of fieri facias, shall be appraised previous to the sale thereof," the like proceedings are to be had on executions issuing out of the courts of the United States. So, also, by the act of May 7, 1800, c. 199 (XXV.), regulating sales of lands, on judgments obtained by the United States, it is enacted, (sec. 1) "that where the United States shall have obtained judgment in civil actions brought in those states wherein, by the laws and practice of such states, lands, or other real estate, belonging to the debtor, are delivered to the creditor in satisfaction of such judgment," etc., the marshal is to proceed to sell at public auction, and to execute a grant to the highest bidder. These legislative expositions were made long before the present case arose, and are as binding in fixing the sense of the legislature as any declaratory act which Congress could make on the subject.

The process acts regulate the forms of writs, and the modes of proceeding in suits, and give the courts the power to alter both. The 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, gives 19*] *to the courts power to issue writs "necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." Where a court has issued the execution, according to the form provided under the process acts, it has done all that is authorized by the 14th section of the judiciary act, and by the process acts. The rule which is to govern the manner of levying the execution, is to be found in the 34th section of the judiciary act. Various regulations prevail in the states, as to what property is liable to execution. In some, lands are exempt, except upon an elegit; in others, certain personal property is exempt; in all, the ca. sa. is variously modified. How are all these conflicting regulations to be reconciled, but by resorting to the wise and safe provision contained in the 34th section of the judiciary act, which gives the same rule as to the substance of the remedy which applies to the right in controversy, and the same for the federal courts as is used at the time in the state courts?

To the argument which had been urged for the plaintiffs, that, upon the supposition that executions from the federal courts are to be regulated by the local laws in each state, the state legislatures might entirely defeat the administration of justice in those courts, by exempting all property from execution, it was answered, that Congress (supposing them to possess the constitutional power) might, at any time, apply an effectual remedy by enacting a uniform law on the subject; and that, in the meantime, all regulations *made [*20 by the states must apply equally to their own courts; and it was an inadmissible and extravagant supposition that any state would thus entirely suspend the course of civil justice. It was the province of every sovereign legislature to regulate it, so far as the society had not surrendered that right to another power. In the present instance, even supposing the constitution to be silent on the subject, Congress had shown a disposition to leave to the states the power of regulating it, except as to cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, and of peculiar federal cognizance, and excepting that general power of regulating the forms of process, and proceedings, which is essential to every court of justice.

The cause was continued to the present term for advisement.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

Some preliminary objections have been made by the counsel for the defendants, to the manner in which these questions are brought before the court, which are to be disposed of before the questions themselves can be considered.

It is said that the proceeding was ex parte. The law which empowers this court to take cognizance of questions adjourned from a circuit, gives jurisdiction over the single point on which the judges were divided, not over the whole cause. The inquiry, therefore, whether the parties *were properly before the [*21 Circuit Court, cannot be made, at this time, in this place.

The defendants also insist, that the judgment, the execution, and the return, ought to be stated, in order to enable this court to decide the question which is adjourned.

But the questions do not arise on the judgment, or the execution; and, so far as they depend on the return, enough of that is stated to show the court that the marshal had proceeded according to the late laws of Kentucky. In a general question respecting the obligation of these laws on the officer, it is immaterial whether he has been exact, or otherwise, in his observance of them. It is the principle on which the judges were divided, and that alone is referred to this court.

In arguing the first question, the plaintiffs contend that the common law, as modified by acts of Congress, and the rules of this court, and of the Circuit Court by which the judgment was rendered, must govern the officer in all his proceedings upon executions of every description.

One of the counsel for the defendants insists that Congress has no power over executions issued on judgments obtained by individuals; and that the authority of the states, on this subject, remains unaffected by the constitution. That the government of the Union cannot, by law, regulate the conduct of its officers in the service of executions on judgments rendered in the federal courts; but that the state legislatures retain complete authority over them.

The court cannot accede to this novel con- 22*] struction. *The constitution concludes its enumeration of granted powers, with a clause authorizing Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. The judicial department is invested with jurisdiction in certain specified cases, in all which it has power to render judgment.

That a power to make laws for carrying into execution all the judgments which the judicial department has power to pronounce, is expressly conferred by this clause, seems to be one of those plain propositions which reasoning cannot render plainer. The terms of the clause neither require nor admit of elucidation. The court, therefore, will only say, that no doubt whatever is entertained on the power of Congress over the subject. The only inquiry is, how far has this power been exercised?

The 13th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, describes the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and grants the power to issue writs of prohibition and mandamus, in certain specified cases. The 14th section enacts, "that all the before-mentioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." The 17th section authorizes the courts "to make all necessary rules for the 23*] orderly conducting business *in the said courts;" and the 18th empowers a court to suspend execution, in order to give time for granting a new trial.

These sections have been relied on by the counsel for the plaintiffs.

The words of the 14th are understood by the court to comprehend executions. An execution is a writ, which is certainly "agreeable to the principles and usages of law."

There is no reason for supposing that the general term "writs," is restrained by the words, "which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions," to original process, or to process anterior to judgments. The jurisdiction of a court is not exhausted by the rendition of its judgment, but continues until that judgment shall be satisfied. Many questions arise on the process subsequent to the judgment, in which jurisdiction is to be exercised. It is, therefore, no unreasonable extension of the words of the act, to suppose an execution necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction. Were it even true, that jurisdiction could technically be said to terminate with the judgment, an execution would be a writ necessary for the perfection of that which was previously done; and would, consequently, be necessary to the beneficial exercise of jurisdiction. If any doubt could exist on this subject, the 18th section, which treats of the authority of the court over its executions as actually existing, certainly implies that the power to issue them had been granted in the 14th section. The same implication is afforded by the 24th *and 25th sections, both [*24 of which proceed on the idea that the power to issue writs of execution was in possession of the courts. So, too, the process act, which was depending at the same time with the judiciary act, prescribes the forms of executions, but does not give a power to issue them.

On the clearest principles of just construction, then, the 14th section of the judiciary act must be understood, as giving to the courts of the Union, respectively, a power to issue executions on their judgments.

But this section provides singly for issuing the writ, and prescribes no rule for the conduct of the officer while obeying its mandate. It has been contended that the 34th section of the act supplies this deficiency.

That section enacts, "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes, of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

This section has never, so far as is recollected, received a construction in this court; but it has, we believe, been generally considered by gentlemen of the profession, as furnishing a rule to guide the court in the formation of its judgment; not one for carrying that judgment into execution. It is "a rule of decision," and the proceedings after judgment are merely ministerial. It is, too, "a rule of decision in trials at *common law;" a [*25 phrase which presents clearly to the mind the idea of litigation in court, and could never occur to a person intending to describe an execution, or proceedings after judgment, or the effect of those proceedings. It is true, that if, after the service of an execution, a question respecting the legality of the proceeding should be brought before the court by a regular suit, there would be a trial at common law; and it may be said, that the case provided for by the section would then occur, and that the law of the state would furnish the rule for its decision.

But, by the words of the section, the laws of the state furnish a rule of decision for those cases only "where they apply;" and the question arises, do they apply to such a case? In the solution of this question, it will be necessary to inquire whether they regulate the conduct of the officer serving the execution; for it would be contrary to all principle to admit, that, in the trial of a suit depending on the legality of an official act, any other law would apply than that which had been previously described for the government of the officer. If the execution is governed by a different rule, then these laws do not apply to a case depending altogether on the regularity of the proceedings under the execution. If, for example, an officer take the property of A, to satisfy an execution against B, and a suit be brought by A, the question of property must depend entirely on the law of the state. But if an exe-26*] cution issue against A, as *he supposes, irregularly or if the officer should be supposed to act irregularly in the performance of his duty, and A should, in either case, proceed against the officer, the state laws will give no rule of decision in the trial, because they do not apply to the case, unless they be adopted by this section as governing executions on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States. Before we can assume that the state law applies to such a case, we must show that it governs the officer in serving the execution; and, consequently, its supposed application to such a case is no admissible argument in support of the proposition that it does govern the execution. That proposition, so far as it depends on the construction of the 34th section, has already been considered; and we think that, in framing it, the legislature could not have extended its views beyond the judgment of the court.

The 34th section, then, has no application to the practice of the court, or to the conduct of its officer, in the service of an execution.

The 17th section would seem, both from the context and from the particular words which have been cited as applicable to this question, to be confined to business actually transacted in court, and not to contemplate proceedings out of court.

The act to "regulate processes in the courts of the United States," passed in 1789, has also been referred to. It enacts, "that until farther provision shall be made, and except where by this act, or other statutes of the United States, 27*] *is otherwise provided, the forms of writs and executions, except their style, and modes of process, in the circuit and district courts, in suits at common law, shall be the same in each state, respectively, as are now used in the supreme courts of the same.

This act, so far as respects the writ, is plainly confined to form. But form, in this particular, it has been argued, has much of substance in it, because it consists of the language of the writ, which specifies precisely what the officer is to do. His duty is prescribed in the writ, and he has only to obey its mandate.

This is certainly true, so far as respects the object to be accomplished, but not as respects the manner of accomplishing it. In a fi. fa., for example, the officer is commanded to make of the goods and chattels of A. B. the sum of money specified in the writ; and this sum must, of course, be made by a sale. But the time and manner of the sale, and the particular goods and chattels which are liable to the execution, unless, indeed, all are liable, are not prescribed.

To "the forms of writs and executions," the law adds the words, "and modes of process." These words must have been intended to comprehend something more than "the forms of writs and executions." We have not a right to consider them as mere tautology. They have a meaning, and ought to be allowed an operation more extensive than the preceding words. The term is applicable to writs and executions, but it is also applicable to every step taken in a cause. *It indicates the progressive [*28 course of the business from its commencement to its termination; and "modes of process" may be considered as equivalent to modes or manner of proceeding. If, by the word process, Congress had intended nothing more than a general phrase, which might comprehend every other paper issuing out of a court, the language would most probably have resembled that of the first section, where the word "processes," not "process," is used in that sense. But the introduction of the word "modes," and the change of the word "processes" for "process," seem to indicate that the word was used in its more extensive sense, as denoting progressive action; a sense belonging to the noun in the singular number, rather than in the sense in which it was used in the first section, which is appropriate to the same noun in its plural number.

This construction is supported by the succeeding sentence, which is in these words: "And the forms and modes of proceedings, in causes of equity, and of admiralty, and maritime jurisdiction, shall be according to the course of the civil law."

The preceding sentence had adopted the forms of writs and executions, and the modes of process, then existing in the courts of the several states, as a rule for the federal courts, "in suits at common law." And this sentence adopts "the forms and modes of proceedings" of the civil law, "in causes of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." It has not, we believe, *been doubted that this [*29 sentence was intended to regulate the whole course of proceeding, "in causes of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." It would be difficult to assign a reason for the solicitute of Congress to regulate all the proceedings of the court, sitting as a court of equity, or of admiralty, which would not equally require that its proceedings should be regulated when sitting as a court of common law. The two subjects were equally within the province of the legislature, equally demanded their attention, and were brought together to their view. If, then, the words making provision for each, fairly admit of an equally extensive interpretation, and of one which will effect the object that seems to have been in contemplation, and which was certainly desirable, they ought to receive that interpretation. "The forms of writs and executions, and modes of process in suits at common law," and "the forms and modes of proceedings, in causes of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," embrace the same subject, and both relate to the progress of a suit from its commencement to its close.

It has been suggested, that the words, "in suits at common law," restrain the preceding words to proceedings between the original writ and judgment. But these words belong to "writs and executions," as well as to "modes of process," and no more limit the one than the other. As executions can issue only after a 30*] judgment, *the words "in suits at common law," must apply to proceedings which take place after judgment.

But the legal sense of the word suit adheres to the case after the rendition of the judgment, and it has been so decided.[1]

This construction is fortified by the proviso, which is in these words: "Provided, that on judgments, in any of the cases aforesaid, where different kinds of executions are issuable in succession, a capias ad satisfaciendum being one, the plaintiff shall have his election to take out a capias ad satisfaciendum in the first instance, and be at liberty to pursue the same, until a tender of the debt and costs in gold or silver shall be made."

The proviso is generally intended to restrain the enacting clause, and to except something which would otherwise have been within it, or, in some measure, to modify the enacting clause. The object of this proviso is to enable the creditor to take out a capias ad satisfaciendum in the first instance, and to pursue it until the debt be satisfied, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the enacting clause. It is perfectly clear, that this provision is no exception from that part of the enacting clause which relates to the "forms of writs and executions," and can be an exception to that part only which relates to the "modes of process." It secures the right to elect the capias ad satisfaciendum, in the first instance, where that writ was at all issuable under the law of the state; and to pursue it until the debt and 31*] *costs be tendered in gold or silver. It relates to the time and circumstances under which the execution may issue, and to the conduct of the officer while in possession of the execution. These, then, are objects which Congress supposed to be reached by the words, "modes of process," in the enacting clause.

This law, though temporary, has been considered with some attention, because the permanent law has reference to it, and adopts some of its provisions. It was continued until 1792, when a perpetual act was passed on the subject. This, whether merely explanatory, or also amendatory of the original act, is the law which must decide the question now before the court.

It enacts, that the forms of writs, executions and other process, except their style, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits in those of common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively, in pursuance of the act entitled, "An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States," except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States; subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same.

This act is drawn with more deliberation than the original act; and removes, so far as 32*] respects *the question now under consideration, some doubt which might be entertained in relation to the correctness with which the act of 1789 has been construed. It distinguishes very clearly between the forms of writs, and all other process of the same character, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits, and provides for both. It is impossible to confound "the forms of writs, execution and other process," which are to be attested by a judge, and to be under the seal of the court from which they issue, with "the forms and modes of proceeding in suits. They are distinct subjects. The first describes the paper which issues from the court, and is an authority to the officer to do that which it commands; the last embraces the whole progress of the suit, and every transaction in it, from its commencement to its termination, which has been already shown not to take place until the judgment shall be satisfied. It may, then, and ought to be understood, as prescribing the conduct of the officer in the execution of process, that being a part of "the proceedings" in the suit. This is to conform to the law of the state, as it existed in September, 1789. The act adopts the state law as it then stood, not as it might afterwards be made.

A comparison of the proviso to the permanent act, with that which has been introduced into the temporary act, will serve to illustrate the idea that the proceedings under the execution were contemplated in the enacting clause, and supposed to be prescribed by the words, "modes of process," *in the one law, and [*33 "modes of proceeding," in the other.

The proviso to the act of 1789, authorizes the creditor to sue out a capias ad satisfaciendum in the first instance, and to continue it "until a tender of the debt in gold and silver shall be made." The proviso to the act of 1798, omits this last member of the sentence.

The appraisement laws existing in some of the states, authorized a debtor taking in execution to tender property in discharge of his person; and this part of the proviso shows an opinion that the enacting clause adopted this privilege, and an intention to deprive him of it. The enacting clause of the act of 1793, adopts the state law, to precisely the same extent with the enacting clause of the act of 1789; and the omission of the clause in the proviso which has been mentioned, leaves that part of the adopted law which allows the creditor to discharge his person by the tender of property, in force.

The subject was resumed in 1793, in the act, entitled, "An act in addition to the act entitled an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States."

The 8th section enacts, "that, where it is now required by the laws of any state, that goods taken in execution on a writ of fieri facias shall be appraised previous to the sale thereof, it shall be lawful for the appraisers appointed under the authority of the state, to appraise goods taken in execution on a fieri facias issued out of any court of the United States, in the same manner *as if such [*34 writ had issued out of a court held under the authority of the state; and it shall be the duty of the marshal, in whose custody such goods may be, to summon the appraisers in like manner as the sheriff is, by the laws of the state, required to summon them;" "and if the appraisers, being duly summoned, shall fail to attend and perform the duties required of them, the marshal may proceed to sell such goods without an appraisement."

This act refers to the appraisement laws of the respective states, which were in force at the time of its passage, without distinguishing between those which were enacted before, and those which were enacted after, September, 1789. The fact, however, is understood to be, that they were enacted previous to that time, generally as temporary laws, and had been continued by subsequent acts. They required, so far as they have been inspected, that appraisers should be appointed by the local tribunals to appraise the property taken in execution. Supposing laws of this description to have been adopted by the act of 1789, the regular mode of proceeding under them would have been, for the courts of the United States, respectively, to appoint appraisers, who should perform the same duty with respect to executions issuing out of the courts of the Union, as was performed by appraisers appointed under state authority, with respect to executions issuing out of the courts of the state. It was unquestionably much more convenient to employ that machinery which was already 35*] in operation, for such a *purpose, than to construct a distinct system; it was more convenient to employ the appraisers already existing in the several counties of a state, than to appoint a number of new appraisers, who could not be known to the courts making such appointments. Accordingly, the section under consideration does not profess to adopt the appraisement laws of the several states, but proceeds on the idea that they were already adopted, and authorizes the officer to avail himself of the agency of those persons who had been selected by the local tribunals, to appraise property taken in execution. Had these laws been supposed to derive their authority to control the proceedings of the courts of the United States, not from being adopted by Congress, but from the vigor imparted to them by the state legislatures, the intervention of Congress would have been entirely unnecessary. The power which was competent to direct the appraisement, was competent to appoint the appraisers.

The act passed in 1800, "for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," takes up a subject on which every state in the Union had acted previous to September, 1789. It authorizes the marshal to allow the benefit of the prison rules to those who are in custody under process issued from the courts of the United States, in the same manner as it is allowed to those who are imprisoned under process issued from the courts of the respective states.

Congress took up this subject in 1792, and provided for it by a temporary law, which was 36*] *continued from time to time, until the permanent law of 1800. It is the only act to which the attention of the court has been drawn, that can countenance the opinion that the legislature did not consider the process act as regulating the conduct of an officer in the service of executions. It may be supposed, that, in adopting the state laws as furnishing the rule for proceedings in suits at common law, that rule was as applicable to writs of capias ad satisfaciendum, as of fieri facias; and that the marshal would be as much bound to allow a prisoner the benefit of the rules under the act of Congress, as to sell upon the notice, and on the credit prescribed by the state laws.

The suggestion is certainly entitled to consideration. But were it true, that the process acts would, on correct construction, adopt the state laws which give to a debtor the benefit of the rules, this single act of superfluous legislation, which might be a precaution suggested by the delicacy of the subject, by an anxiety to insure such mitigation of the hardships of imprisonment as the citizens of the respective states were accustomed to see, and to protect the officer from the hazard of liberating the person of an imprisoned debtor, could not countervail the arguments to be drawn from every other law passed in relation to proceedings on executions, and from the omission to pass laws, which would certainly be requisite to direct the conduct of the officer, if a rule was not furnished by the process act.

*But there is a distinction between [*37 the cases, sufficient to justify this particular provision. The jails in which prisoners were to be confined did not belong to the government of the Union, and the privilege of using them was ceded by the several states, under a compact with the United States. The jailers were state officers, and received prisoners committed under process of the courts of the United States, in obedience to the laws of their respective states. Some doubt might reasonably be entertained, how far the process act might be understood to apply to them.

The resolution of Congress under which the use of the state jails was obtained, "recommended it to the legislatures of the several states, to pass laws, making it expressly the duty of the keepers of their jails, to receive, and safe keep therein, all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, until they shall be discharged by due course of the laws thereof." The laws of the states, so far as they have been examined, conform to this resolution. Doubts might well be entertained, of permitting the prisoner, under this resolution, and these laws, to have the benefit of the rules. The removal of such doubts seems to have been a prudent precaution.

The case of Palmer v. Allen, 7 Cranch's Rep. 550 may be considered, at first sight, as supporting the opinion that the acts for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, do not adopt the laws of the several states, as they stood in September, 1789, as the rule by *which the officers of the [*38 federal courts are to be governed in the service of process issuing out of those courts; but, upon an examination of that case, this impression will be removed.

In that case, as appears from the statement of the judge who delivered the opinion of this court, Palmer, as deputy-marshal, arrested Allen on a writ sued out of the District Court of Connecticut, by the United States, to recover a penalty under a statute of the United States. Bail was demanded, and, not being given, Allen was committed to prison. For this commitment Allen brought an action of trespass, assault and battery, and false imprisonment, in the state court. Palmer pleaded the whole matter in justification, and, upon demurrer, the plea was held insufficient. The judgment of the state court was brought before this court by writ of error, and was reversed; this court being of opinion that the plea was a good bar to the action.

The demurrer was sustained in the state court, because, by an act of the legislature of Connecticut, the officer serving process similar to that which was served by Palmer, must, before committing the person on whom it is served to jail, obtain a mittimus from a magistrate of the state, authorizing such commitment; and that court was of opinion that the act of Congress had adopted this rule so as to make it obligatory on the officer of the Federal Court.

This court was of opinion that the plea made out a sufficient justification, and, therefore reversed the judgment of the state court. 39*] This *judgment of reversal is to be sustained, for several reasons, without impugning the general principle that the acts under consideration adopt the state laws as they stood in September, 1789, as giving the mode of proceeding in executing process issuing out of the courts of the United States.

The act of 1792, for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, enacts, that "the modes of proceeding in suits, in those of common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively, in pursuance of the act, entitled, 'An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States.'"

The indorsement of a mittimus on the writ had never been used, as appears by the opinion in the case of Palmer v. Allen, in the courts of the United States for the district of Connecticut. In connection with this fact, the provision of the act of 1792 subjects the modes of proceeding under the laws of the state, "to such alterations and additions as the said courts, respectively, shall, in their discretion, deem expedient." The uniform course of that court, from its first establishment, dispensing with this mittimus, may be considered as the alteration in this particular which the court was authorized by law to make.

It may very well be doubted, too, whether the act of Congress which conforms the modes of proceeding in the courts of the Union to those in the several states, requires the agency of state officers, in any case whatever not expressly mentioned. The laws of the Union 40*] may permit *such agency, but it is by no means clear that they can compel it. In the case of the appraisement laws already noticed, it was deemed necessary to pass a particular act, authorizing the marshal to avail himself of the appraisers for the state; and the same law dispenses with the appraisement, should they fail to attend. If the mittimus should be required by the act of Congress, it should be awarded by a judge of the United States, not by a state magistrate, in like manner as an order for bail, in doubtful cases, is indorsed by a judge of the United States, in cases where the state law requires such indorsement to be made by the judge or justice of the court from which the process issues. The mittimus is a commitment for want of bail; and the magistrate who awards it, decides, in doing so, that it is a case in which bail is demandable. But in the particular case of Allen, that question was decided by the law. The act of Congress (act of 1799, c. 128, s. 65) required that bail should be given. No application to the judge was necessary. The officer was compelled to arrest the body of Allen, and to detain him in custody until bail should be given. This act, therefore, dispenses with any order of a judge requiring bail, and with a mittimus authorizing a commitment for the want of bail. The officer was obliged to detain the body of Allen in custody, and this duty was best performed by committing him to jail. These reasons operated with the court as additional to the opinion that the law of Connecticut, requiring a mittimus *in civil cases, was, in its terms, a [*41 peculiar municipal regulation imposing a restraint on state officers, which was not adopted by the process act of the United States, and was a provision inapplicable to the courts of the Union, a provision which could not be carried into effect according to its letter.

The reasons assigned by the court for its decision in the case of Palmer v. Allen, so far from implying an opinion that the process act does not adopt the laws of the several states as giving a rule to be observed by the officer in executing process issuing from the courts of the United States, recognizes the general principle, and shows why that case should be taken out of its operation.

So far as the process act adopts the state laws, as regulating the modes of proceeding in suits at common law, the adoption is expressly confined to those in force in September, 1789. The act of Congress does not recognize the authority of any laws of this description which might be afterwards passed by the states. The system, as it then stood, is adopted, "subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same."

This provision enables the several courts of the Union to make such improvements in its *forms and modes of proceeding, as ex- [*42 perience may suggest, and especially to adopt such state laws on this subject, as might vary to advantage the forms and modes of proceeding which prevailed in September, 1789.

The counsel for the defendants contend that this clause, if extended beyond the mere regulation of practice in the court, would be a delegation of legislative authority which Congress can never be supposed to intend, and has not the power to make.

But Congress has expressly enabled the courts to regulate their practice by other laws. The 17th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, enacts, "that all the said courts shall have power" "to make and establish all necessary rules for the orderly conducting business in the said courts, provided such rules are not repugnant to the laws of the United States;" and the 7th section of the act, "in addition to the act, entitled, An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States" (act of 1793, ch. 22, s. 7), details more at large the powers conferred by the 17th section of the judiciary act. These sections give the court full power over all matters of practice; and it is not reasonable to suppose that the process act was intended solely for the same object. The language is different; and the two sections last mentioned have no reference to state laws.

It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and ex- [*43
43*] clusively legislative. *But Congress may certainly delegate to others, powers which the legislature may rightfully exercise itself. Without going farther for examples, we will take that, the legality of which the counsel for the defendants admit. The 17th section of the judiciary act, and the 7th section of the additional act, empower the courts respectively to regulate their practice. It certainly will not be contended that this might not be done by Congress. The courts, for example, may make rules, directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, and other things of the same description. It will not be contended that these things might not be done by the legislature, without the intervention of the courts; yet it is not alleged that the power may not be conferred on the judicial department.

The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details. To determine the character of the power given to the courts by the process act, we must inquire into its extent. It is expressly extended to those forms and modes of proceeding in suits at common law, which were used in the state courts in September, 1789, and were adopted by that act. What, then, was adopted?

44*] *We have supposed, that the manner of proceeding under an execution was comprehended by the words "forms and modes of proceeding in suits" at common law. The writ commands the officer to make the money for which judgment has been rendered. This must be understood as directing a sale, and, perhaps, as directing a sale for ready money. But the writ is entirely silent with respect to the notice; with respect to the disposition which the officer is to make of the property between the seizure and sale; and, probably, with respect to several other circumstances which occur in obeying its mandate. These are provided for in the process act. The modes of proceeding used in the courts of the respective states are adopted for the courts of the Union, and they not only supply what is not fully expressed in the writ, but have, in some respects, modified the writ itself, by prescribing a more indirect and circuitous mode of obeying its mandate than the officer could be justified in adopting. In some instances, the officer is permitted to leave the property with the debtor, on terms prescribed by the law, and in others, to sell on a prescribed credit, instead of ready money.

Now, suppose the power to alter these modes of proceeding, which the act conveys in general terms, was specifically given. The execution orders the officer to make the sum mentioned in the writ out of the goods and chattels of the debtor. This is completely a legislative provision, which leaves the officer to exercise his discretion respecting the notice. That the legislature *may transfer this discretion [*45 to the courts, and enable them to make rules for its regulation, will not, we presume, be questioned. So with respect to the provision for leaving the property taken by the officer in the hands of the debtor, till the day of sale. He may do this, independent of any legislative act, at his own peril. The law considers the property as his, for the purposes of the execution. He may sell it, should it be produced, in like manner as if he had retained it in his personal custody, or may recover it, should it be withheld from him. The law makes it his duty to do that which he might do in the exercise of his discretion, and relieves him from the responsibility attendant on the exercise of discretion, in a case where his course is not exactly prescribed, and he deviates from that which is most direct. The power given to the court to vary the mode of proceeding in this particular, is a power to vary minor regulations, which are within the great outlines marked out by the legislature in directing the execution. To vary the terms on which a sale is to be made, and declare whether it shall be on credit, or for ready money, is certainly a more important exercise of the power of regulating the conduct of the officer, but is one of the same principle. It is, in all its parts, the regulation of the conduct of the officer of the court in giving effect to its judgments. A general superintendence over this subject seems to be properly within the judicial province, and has been always so considered. It is, undoubtedly, proper for the legislature to prescribe the manner *in which these ministerial offi- [*46 ces shall be performed, and this duty will never be devolved on any other department without urgent reasons. But, in the mode of obeying the mandate of a writ issuing from a court, so much of that which may be done by the judiciary, under the authority of the legislature, seems to be blended with that for which the legislature must expressly and directly provide, that there is some difficulty in discerning the exact limits within which the legislature may avail itself of the agency of its courts.

The difference between the departments undoubtedly is, that the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law; but the maker of the law may commit something to the discretion of the other departments, and the precise boundary of this power is a subject of delicate and difficulty inquiry, into which a court will not enter unnecessarily.

Congress, at the introduction of the present government, was placed in a peculiar situation. A judicial system was to be prepared, not for a consolidated people, but for distinct societies, already possessing distinct systems, and accustomed to laws, which, though originating in the same great principles, had been variously modified. The perplexity arising from this state of things was much augmented by the circumstance that, in many of the states, the pressure of the moment had produced deviations from that course of administering justice between debtor and creditor, which consisted, not only with the spirit of the constitution, and, 47*] consequently, with *the views of the government, but also with what might safely be considered as the permanent policy, as well as interest, of the states themselves. The new government could neither entirely disregard these circumstances, nor consider them as permanent. In adopting the temporary mode of proceeding with executions then prevailing in the several states, it was proper to provide for that return to ancient usage, and just as well as wise principles, which might be expected from those who had yielded to a supposed necessity in departing from them. Congress, probably, conceived that this object would be best effected by placing in the courts of the Union the power of altering the "modes of proceeding in suits at common law," which includes the modes of proceeding in the execution of their judgments, in the confidence, that in the exercise of this power, the ancient, permanent and approved system would be adopted by the courts, at least as soon as it should be restored in the several states by their respective legislatures. Congress could not have intended to give permanence to temporary laws of which it disapproved; and, therefore, provided for their change in the very act which adopted them.

But the objection which gentlemen make to this delegation of legislative power seems to the court to be fatal to their argument. If Congress cannot invest the courts with the power of altering the modes of proceeding of their own officers, in the service of executions issued on their own judgments, how will gentle-48*] men defend a delegation *of the same power to the state legislatures? The state assemblies do not constitute a legislative body for the Union. They possess no portion of that legislative power which the constitution vests in Congress, and cannot receive it by delegation. How, then, will gentlemen defend their construction of the 34th section of the judiciary act? From this section they derive the whole obligation which they ascribe to subsequent acts of the state legislatures over the modes of proceeding in the courts of the Union. This section is unquestionably prospective, as well as retrospective. It regards future, as well as existing laws. If, then, it embraces the rules of practice, the modes of proceeding in suits; if it adopts future state laws to regulate the conduct of the officer in the performance of his official duties, it delegates to the state legislatures the power which the constitution has conferred on Congress, and which, gentlemen say, is incapable of delegation.

As construed by the court, this section is the recognition of a principle of universal law; the principle that in every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made.

But the question respecting the right of the courts to alter the modes of proceeding in suits at common law, established in the process act, does not arise in this case. That is not the point on which the judges at the circuit were divided, and which they have adjourned to this court. The question really adjourned is, whether the laws of Kentucky respecting execu-49*] tions, *passed subsequent to the process act, are applicable to executions which issue on judgments rendered by the federal courts.

If they be, their applicability must be maintained, either in virtue of the 34th section of the judiciary act, or in virtue of an original inherent power in the state legislatures, independent of any act of Congress, to control the modes of proceedings in suits depending in the courts of the United States, and to regulate the conduct of their officers in the service of executions issuing out of those courts.

That the power claimed for the state is not given by the 34th section of the judiciary act, has been fully stated in the preceding part of this opinion. That it has not an independent existence in the state legislatures, is, we think, one of those political axioms, an attempt to demonstrate which would be a waste of argument not to be excused. The proposition has not been advanced by counsel in this case, and will, probably, never be advanced. Its utter inadmissibility will at once present itself to the mind, if we imagine an act of a state legislature for the direct and sole purpose of regulating proceedings in the courts of the Union, or of their officers in executing their judgments. No gentleman, we believe, will be so extravagant as to maintain the efficacy of such an act. It seems not much less extravagant, to maintain that the practice of the federal courts, and the conduct of their officers, can be indirectly regulated by the state legislatures, by an act professing to regulate *the proceedings of the state courts, [*50 and the conduct of the officers who execute the process of those courts. It is a general rule, that what cannot be done directly from defect of power, cannot be done indirectly.

The right of Congress to delegate to the courts the power of altering the modes (established by the process act) of proceedings in suits, has been already stated; but, were it otherwise, we are well satisfied that the state legislatures do not possess that power.

This opinion renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions adjourned in this case. If the laws do not apply to the federal courts, no question concerning their constitutionality can arise in those courts.

Certificate.—This cause came on to be heard on the questions certified from the United States Court for the seventh circuit and district of Kentucky, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, that the statutes of Kentucky in relation to executions, which are referred to in the questions certified to this court, on a division of opinion of the said judges of the said Circuit Court, are not applicable to executions which issue on judgments rendered by the courts of the United States; which is directed to be certified to the said Circuit Court.

THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. HALSTEAD.

The Act of Assembly of Kentucky of the 21st of December, 1821, which prohibits the sale of property taken under executions for less than three-fourths of its appraised value, without the consent of the owner, does not apply to a venditioni exponas issued out of the Circuit Court for the district of Kentucky.

The laws of the United States authorize the courts of the Union so to alter the form of process of execution used in the Supreme Courts of the states in 1789, so as to subject to execution lands and other property, not thus subject by the state laws in force at that time.

THIS cause was argued at the last term, by the same counsel with the preceding case of Wayman v. Southard (ante, p. 1), and continued to the present term for advisement.

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up on a division of opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, upon a motion there made to quash the return of the marshal upon a venditioni exponas issued in this cause. The writ commanded the marshal to expose to sale certain articles of property therein particularly specified; and, among other things, two hundred acres of land of Abraham Venable, one of the defendants. The marshal, in his return, states substantially, [*52] that he had exposed to *sale, for cash, the lands mentioned in the writ, no indorsement having been made on the execution, to receive in payment certain bank notes, according to the provision of the laws of Kentucky. That [illegible]nds had been valued at $26 per acre, [illegible]on the offer for sale, no more than fi[illegible]per acre was bid; which, not being [illegible]rths of the appraised value, the land [illegible] sold; thereby conforming his pro[illegible] under the venditioni exponas to the [illegible]ons of the law of Kentucky of the 21st [illegible]December, 1821, which prohibits the sale of property taken under executions, for less than three-fourths of its appraised value, without the consent of the owner.

The motion in the court below was to quash this return, and to direct the marshal to proceed to sell the land levied upon, without regard to the act above referred to. Upon this motion, the judges, being divided in opinion, have, according to the provisions of the act of Congress in such cases, certified to this court the following questions:

1. Whether the said act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, when applied to this case, was, or was not, repugnant to the constitution of the United States; and,

2. Whether, if it were not repugnant to the constitution, it would operate upon, and bind, and direct, the mode in which the venditioni exponas should be enforced by the marshal, and forbid a sale of the land levied upon, unless it commanded three-fourths of its value [53*] when estimated *according to the provisions of the said act.

In examining these questions, I shall invert the order in which they have been certified to this court, because, if the law does not apply to the case so as to regulate and govern the conduct of the marshal, it will supersede the necessity of inquiring into its constitutionality.

It ought to be borne in mind, that this law does not profess, in terms, to extend to marshals, or to executions issued out of the courts of the United States; and it is only under some general expressions, that either can, by possibility, be embraced within the law. And it ought not, in justice to the legislature, to be presumed that it was intended, by any general terms there used, to regulate and control that over which it is so manifest they had no authority.

It cannot certainly be contended, with the least color of plausibility, that Congress does not possess the uncontrolled power to legislate with respect both to the form and effect of executions issued upon judgments recovered in the courts of the United States. The judicial power would be incomplete, and entirely inadequate to the purposes for which it was intended, if, after judgment, it could be arrested in its progress, and denied the right of enforcing satisfaction in any manner which shall be prescribed by the laws of the United States. The authority to carry into complete effect the judgments of the courts, necessarily results, by implication, from the power to ordain and establish such courts. *But [*54 it does not rest altogether upon such implication; for express authority is given to Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. The right of Congress, therefore, to regulate the proceedings on executions, and direct the mode, and manner, and out of what property of the debtor satisfaction may be obtained, is not to be questioned, and the only inquiry is, how far this power has been exercised. The critical review taken by the Chief Justice of the various laws of the United States, in the opinion delivered in the case of Wayman v. Southard,[1] very much abridges an examination that might otherwise have been proper in this case. The result of that opinion shows that Congress has adopted, as the guide for the courts of the United States, the processes which were used and allowed in the supreme courts of the several states, in the year 1789. That the 34th section of the judiciary act, which requires that the laws of the several states shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, has no application to the practice of the courts, or in any manner calls upon them to pursue the various changes which may take place from time to time in the state courts, with respect to their processes, and modes of proceeding under them. The principal *inquiry in this case is, whether the [*55 laws of the United States authorize the courts so to alter the form of the process of execution, which was in use in the Supreme Courts of the several states in the year 1789, as to uphold the venditioni exponas issued in this cause. In the year 1792, when the process act of 1789 was made perpetual, land in the state of Kentucky could not be taken and sold on execution; a law, however, subjecting lands to executions, was passed shortly thereafter in the same year; and the question now arises, whether the Circuit Court of the United States for the Kentucky district, could so alter the process of execution as to authorize the seizure and sale of land by virtue thereof.

For the decision of this question, it is necessary again to recur to some of the acts of Congress which were under consideration in the case referred to, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they do not provide as well for the effect and operation, as for the form of process.

By the 14th section of the judiciary act (2

1.—Ante, p. 20.

L. U. S. 62), power is given to the courts of the United States to issue a writ of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. That executions are among the writs hereby authorized to be issued, cannot admit of a doubt; they are indispensably necessary for the beneficial exercise of the jurisdiction of the courts; and in subsequent 56*] parts of the act, this writ is specifically named as one to be used, and the control which the court, in certain cases, is authorized to exercise over it, is pointed out. The precise limitations and qualifications of this power, under the terms, agreeable to the principles and usages of law, is not, perhaps, so obvious. It doubtless embraces writs sanctioned by the principles and usages of the common law. But it would be too limited a construction, as it respects writs of execution, to restrict it to such only as were authorized by the common law. It was well known to Congress, that there were in use in the state courts, writs of execution, other than such as were conformable to the usages of the common law. And it is reasonable to conclude that such were intended to be included under the general description of writs agreeable to the principles and usages of law. If it had been intended to restrict the power to common law writs, such limitation would probably have been imposed in terms. That it was intended to authorize writs of execution sanctioned by the principles and usages of the state laws, is strongly corroborated by the circumstance that the process act, passed a few days thereafter, adopts such as the only writs of execution to be used. Can it be doubted, but that, under the power here given in the judiciary act, the courts of the United States, in those states where lands were liable to be taken and sold on execution, would have been authorized to issue a like process? But under this act, the courts are not restricted to the 57] kind of process used in the state *courts, or bound in any respect to conform themselves thereto. This latitude of discretion was not deemed expedient to be left with the courts; and the act of the 29th of September, 1789 (2 L. U. S. 72), entitled, "An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States," modifies and limits this power. So far as is material to the present inquiry, it declares that the forms of writs and executions, and modes of process, in the circuit and district courts, in suits at common law, shall be the same in each state respectively, as are now used or allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same. The form of the writ contains substantially directions as to what is to be done under it. Whether mesne or final process, it is on its face so shaped and moulded as to be adapted to the purposes for which it is intended. This act, therefore, adopts the effect as well as the form of the state processes; and as these were various in the different states, it goes further, and adopts the modes of process, which must include everything necessary to a compliance with the command of the writ. The effect and operation of executions must, of course, vary in the different states, according to the different forms which were used and allowed. The mode of proceeding, where lands, for instance, were liable to be taken and sold on execution, was different from that which would be necessary where they were only liable to be extended under an elegit. It was therefore necessary to adopt the modes of process, if the process itself was adopted. This act was temporary; and continued *from time to time, until [*58 the permanent law of the 8th of May, 1792 (2 L. U. S. 299), was passed; the second section of which, so far as relates to the second question, declares that the forms of writs, executions and other process, except their style, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits of common law, in the courts of the United States, shall be the same as are now used in the said courts, in pursuance of the act entitled, "An act to regulate processes in the courts of the United States." This section then goes on to prescribe the rules and principles by which the courts of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, were to be governed; and then follows this provision: "Subject, however, to such alterations and additions, as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule, to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same." There can be no doubt that the power here given to the courts extends to all the subjects in the preceding parts of the section; and embraces as well the forms of process, and modes of proceeding in suits of common law, as those of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It will be perceived, that this act presupposes that, in point of practice, the several courts of the United States had carried into execution the provisions of the act of 1789; and had adopted the forms of process, and modes of proceeding thereon, which were then usual, and allowed *in the Supreme Courts of the respective [*59 states; and it ratifies and continues such practice, and extends it to all the proceedings in suits. This course was no doubt adopted as one better calculated to meet the views and wishes of the several states, than for Congress to have framed an entire system for the courts of the United States, varying from that of the state courts. They had in view, however, state systems then in actual operation, well known and understood, and the propriety and expediency of adopting which, they would well judge of and determine. Hence the restriction in the act, now used and allowed in the Supreme Courts of the several states. There is no part of the act, however, that looks like adopting prospectively, by positive legislative provision, the various changes that might thereafter be made in the state courts. Had such been the intention of Congress, the phraseology of the act would doubtless have been adapted to that purpose. It was, nevertheless, foreseen, that changes probably would be made in the processes and proceedings in the state courts, which might be fit and proper to be adopted in the courts of the United States; and, not choosing to sanction such changes absolutely in anticipation, power is given to the courts over the subject, with a view, no doubt, so to alter and mould their processes and proceedings, as to conform to those of the state courts as nearly as might be, consistently with the ends of justice. This authority must have been given to the courts for some substantial and [*60] beneficial *purpose. If the alterations are limited to mere form, without varying the effect and operation of the process, it would be useless. The power here given, in order to answer the object in view, cannot be restricted to form as contradistinguished from substance, but must be understood as vesting in the courts authority so to frame, mould and shape the process, as to adapt it to the purpose intended.

The general policy of all the laws on this subject is very apparent. It was intended to adopt, and conform to, the state process and proceedings, as the general rule, but under such guards and checks as might be necessary to insure the due exercise of the powers of the courts of the United States. They have authority, therefore, from time to time to alter the process, in such manner as they shall deem expedient, and likewise to make additions thereto, which necessarily implies a power to enlarge the effect and operation of the process. The exercise of this power is, to be sure, left in the discretion of the court; but the object and purpose for which it is given is so plainly marked, that it is hardly to be presumed the courts would omit carrying it into execution, without some substantial reason. And, the better to insure this, authority is given to this court, to prescribe to the circuit and district courts such regulations on the subject as it shall think proper. And should this trust not be duly and discreetly exercised by the courts, it is at all times in the power of Congress to correct the evil by more [*61] specific legislation. But so long as *the courts of the United States shall make such alterations or additions in their process of execution as only to reach property made subject to execution from the state courts, there would seem to be no just ground for complaint. When, therefore, the law of Kentucky made land subject to executions, it was carrying into effect the spirit and object of the act of Congress, for the Circuit Court so to alter and add to the form of its execution, as to authorize the taking and selling the debtor's land.

It is said, however, that this is the exercise of legislative power, which could not be delegated by Congress to the courts of justice. But this objection cannot be sustained. There is no doubt that Congress might have legislated more specifically on the subject, and declared what property should be subject to executions from the courts of the United States. But it does not follow, that because Congress might have done this, they necessarily must do it, and cannot commit the power to the courts of justice. Congress might regulate the whole practice of the courts, if it was deemed expedient so to do; but this power is vested in the courts; and it never has occurred to anyone that it was a delegation of legislative power. The power given to the courts over their process is no more than authorizing them to regulate and direct the conduct of the marshal, in the execution of the process. It relates, therefore, to the ministerial duty of the officer; and partakes no more of legislative power than that discre- [*62] tionary authority intrusted *to every department of the government in a variety of cases. And, as is forcibly observed by the court, in the case of Wayman v. Southard, the same objection arises to delegating this power to the state authorities, as there does to intrusting it to the courts of the United States. It is as much a delegation of legislative power in the one case as in the other. It has been already decided, in the case referred to, that the 34th section of the judiciary act has no application to the practice of the courts of the United States, so as in any manner to govern the form of the process of execution. And all the reasoning of the court, which denies the application of this section to the form, applies with equal force to the effect or extent and operation of the process. If, therefore, Congress has legislated at all upon the effect of executions, they have either adopted and limited it to that which would have been given to the like process from the supreme courts of the respective states, in the year 1789, or have provided for changes, by authorizing the courts of the United States to make such alterations and additions in the process itself, as to give it a different effect.

To limit the operation of an execution now, to that which it would have had in the year 1789, would open a door to many and great inconveniences, which Congress seems to have foreseen and to have guarded against, by giving ample powers to the courts, so to mould their process as to meet whatever changes might take place. And if any doubt existed whether the act of 1792 vests such power in the courts, or with respect to its constitutionality, *the practical construction heretofore [*63 given to it ought to have great weight in determining both questions. It is understood that it has been the general, if not the universal practice of the courts of the United States, so to alter their executions as to authorize a levy upon whatever property is made subject to the like process from the state courts; and under such alterations, many sales of land have no doubt been made, which might be disturbed if a contrary construction should be adopted. That such alteration, both in the form and effect of executions, has been made by the Circuit Court for the district of Kentucky, is certain from the case now before us, as, in 1789, land in Kentucky could not be sold on execution. If the court, then, had the power so to frame and mould the execution in this case, as to extend to lands, the only remaining inquiry is, whether the proceedings on the execution could be arrested and controlled by the state law. And this question would seem to be put at rest by the decision in the case of Wayman v. Southard. The law of Kentucky, as has been already observed, does not in terms profess to exercise any such authority; and if it did, it must be unavailing. An officer of the United States cannot, in the discharge of his duty, be governed and controlled by state laws, any farther than such laws have been adopted and sanctioned by the legislative authority of the United States. And he does not, in such case, act under the authority of the state law, but under that of the United States, *which adopts such law. An execution [*64 is the fruit and end of the suit, and is very aptly called the life of the law. The suit does not terminate with the judgment; and all proceedings on the execution, are proceedings in the suit, and which are expressly, by the act of Congress, put under the regulation and control of the court out of which it issues. It is a power incident to every court from which process issues, when delivered to the proper officer, to enforce upon such officer a compliance with his duty, and a due execution of the process, according to its command. But we are not left to rest upon any implied power of the court, for such authority over the officer. By the 7th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1793 (3 L. U. S. 367), it is declared that "it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, etc., and to regulate the practice of the said courts respectively, in such manner as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to the end to prevent delays in proceedings." To permit the marshal, in this case, to be governed and controlled by the state law, is not only delaying, but may be entirely defeating the effect and operation of the execution, and would be inconsistent with the advancement of justice.

Upon the whole, therefore, the opinion of this court is, that the Circuit Court had authority to alter the form of the process of exe-65*] cution, so as *to extend to real as well as personal property, when, by the laws of Kentucky, lands were made subject to the like process from the state courts; and that the act of the general assembly of Kentucky does not operate upon, and bind, and direct the mode in which the venditioni exponas should be enforced by the marshal, so as to forbid a sale of the land levied upon, unless it commanded three-fourths of its value, according to the provisions of the said act; and that, of course, the return of the marshal is insufficient, and ought to be quashed. This renders it unnecessary to inquire into the constitutionality of the law of Kentucky.

Certificate.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript, etc., and the points on which the judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the seventh circuit and district of Kentucky were divided in opinion, and which were, in pursuance of the act of Congress in that case made and provided, adjourned to this court, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, that the act of the general assembly of Kentucky, referred to in the said questions, cannot operate upon, bind and direct the mode in which the said venditioni exponas should be enforced by the marshal, and forbid a sale of the land levied upon, unless it commanded three-fourths of its value when estimated according to the provisions of the said act; and that this opinion renders it unnecessary to decide whether the said act is, or is 66*] *not, repugnant to the constitution of the United States. All which is directed to be certified to the Circuit Court of the United States for the seventh circuit and district of Kentucky.[1]

[Prize. Instance Court. Slave Trade.]

THE ANTELOPE.

The Vice-Consuls of Spain and Portugal, Libelants.

The African slave trade is contrary to the law of nature, but is not prohibited by the positive law of nations.

Although the slave trade is now prohibited by the laws of most civilized nations, it may still be lawfully carried on by the subjects of those nations who have not prohibited it by municipal acts or treaties.

The slave trade is not piracy, unless made so by the treaties or statutes of the nation to whom the party belongs.

The right of visitation and search does not exist in time of peace. A vessel engaged in the slave trade, even if prohibited by the laws of the country to which it belongs, cannot, for that cause alone, be seized on the high seas, and brought in for adjudication, in time of peace, in the courts of another country. But if the laws of the other country be violated, or the proceeding be authorized by treaty, the act of capture is not in that case unlawful.

*It seems that in case of such a seizure, [*67 possession of Africans is not a sufficient evidence of property, and that the onus probandi is thrown upon the claimant, to show that the possession was lawfully acquired.

Africans who are first captured by a belligerent privateer, fitted out in violation of our neutrality, or by a pirate, and then recaptured and brought into the ports of the United States, under a reasonable suspicion that a violation of the slave trade acts was intended, are not to be restored without full proof of the proprietary interest; for in such a case the capture is lawful.

And whether, in such a case, restitution ought to be decreed at all, was a question on which the court was equally divided.

Where the court is equally divided, the decree of the court below is of course affirmed, so far as the point of division goes.

Although a consul may claim for subjects unknown of his nation, yet restitution cannot be decreed without specific proof of the individual proprietary interest.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Georgia.

These cases were allegations filed by the vice-consuls of Spain and Portugal, claiming certain Africans as the property of subjects of their nation. The material facts were as follows: A privateer, called the Columbia, sailing under a Venezuelan commision, entered the port of Baltimore in the year 1819; clandestinely shipped a crew of thirty or forty men; proceeded to sea, and hoisted the Artegan flag, assuming the name of the Arraganta, and prosecuted a voyage along the coast of Africa, her officers and the greater part of her crew being citizens of the United States. Off the coast of Africa she captured an American vessel, from Bristol, in Rhode Island, from which she took twenty-five Africans; she captured several Portuguese vessels, from which she also took Africans; and she captured a Spanish vessel, called the Antelope, in which 68*] she *also took a considerable number of Africans. The two vessels then sailed in company to the coast of Brazil, where the Arraganta was wrecked, and her master, Metcalf, and a great part of his crew, made prisoners; th rest of the crew, with the armament of the Arraganta, were transferred to the Antelope, which, thus armed, assumed the name of the General Ramirez, under the command of John Smith, a citizen of the United States; and on board this vessel were all the Africans which had been captured by the privateer in the course of her voyage. This vessel, thus freighted, was found hovering near the coast of the United States, by the revenue cutter Dallas, under the command of Captain Jackson, and finally brought into the port of Savannah for adjudication. The Africans, at the time of her capture, amounted to upwards of two hundred and eighty. On their arrival, the vessel, and the Africans, were libeled, and claimed by the Portuguese and Spanish vice-consuls reciprocally. They were also claimed by John Smith, as captured jure belli. They were claimed by the United States, as having been transported from foreign parts by American citizens, in contravention to the laws of the United States, and as entitled to their freedom by those laws, and by the law of nations. Captain Jackson, the master of the revenue cutter, filed an alternative claim for the bounty given by law, if the Africans should be adjudged to the United States; or to salvage, if the whole subject should be adjudged to the Portuguese and Spanish consuls.

1.—In the case of the Bank of the United States v. January, also certified from the Circuit Court of Kentucky, the process was a capias, to which the acts of 1789 and 1792 extend in express terms. This court, therefore, determined, that Congress must be understood to have adopted that process as one that was to issue permanently from the courts of the United States, whenever it was in use, at the epoch contemplated by those acts, as a state process. A certificate was directed accordingly.

69*] *The court dismissed the libel and claim of John Smith. They dismissed the claim of the United States, except as to that portion of the Africans which had been taken from the American vessel. The residue was divided between the Spanish and Portuguese claimants.

No evidence was offered to show which of the Africans were taken from the American vessel, and which from the Spanish and Portuguese; and the court below decreed that, as about one-third of them died, the loss should be averaged among these three different classes; and that sixteen should be designated, by lot, from the whole number, and delivered over to the marshal, according to the law of the United States, as being the fair proportion of the twenty-five proved to have been taken from an American vessel.

The Attorney-General for the appellants, stated that the cases of the respective allegations of the Spanish and Portuguese consuls, upon which distinct appeals had been taken, which had been separately docketed in this court,[1] were so blended together, that it was thought most proper to bring on the hearing in both cases at the same time.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated that the appellants, in the argument of No. 12, might refer to the evidence in No. 13; they might invoke it into this cause, so far as it was necessary for their purpose, and the court would take notice *of the facts which appeared [*70 in the other transcript; but that the two causes must come on separately, and in their order. But it has been thought most expedient to report the two arguments together.

The reasons assigned in the appellants' case, for reversing the decrees of the court below were as follows:

1. That the possession of these Africans by the claimants, before the capture by the privateer, affords no presumption that they were their property; that they must show a law entitling them to hold them as property.

2. That if these Africans are to be considered as having been in a state of slavery, when in the Spanish and Portuguese vessels from which they were taken, and if the court shall consider itself bound to restore them to the condition from which they were taken, this can be done only by placing them in the hands of those who shall prove themselves to have been the owners; and that this purpose cannot be answered by restoring them to the consuls of Spain and Portugal.

3. That if some of these Africans were the property of the claimants, yet some were not; and failing to prove which were theirs, the decree is erroneous, in determining by lot a matter which the claimants were bound to establish by proof.

Mr. Key, for the appellants, argued that the facts of the case presented the question to be considered in a point of view, peculiarly favorable *to the appellants. A piratical ves- [*71 sel was found hovering near our coast, apparently meditating a violation of our laws. It was brought, with the persons on board, into the custody of the court, by an act of seizure, not only lawful, but meritorious towards the

The African slave trade is an offense against the municipal laws of most nations in Europe. 1 Kent's Com. 191.

The African slave trade, abstractedly considered, is inconsistent with the law of nations; and a claim founded upon it may be repelled in any court where it is asserted, unless the trade be legalized by the nation to which the claimant belongs. U. S. v. La Jeune Eugenie, 2 Mas. 409.

Slaves captured in time of war and brought into the United States, will not be condemned as prize, nor will the court consider them as prisoners of war; the disposition of them is matter of state in which it is not for the judiciary to determine. Almelda v. Certain Slaves, 5 Hall's Am. L. Journ. 459.

claimants, since it rescued what they claim as their property, from the grasp of pirates. If the claimants had not interposed, the course of the court would have been obvious. The illegal and piratical capture by our citizens, gave them no rights; and even if it did, they instantly forfeited them under our laws, which they intended to violate. But the claimants demand restitution of the Africans found on board this vessel, alleging them to be their property, lawfully acquired on the coast of Africa, and piratically taken from them by the Arraganta. This demand is resisted by the government of the United States, upon the ground that the persons in question are not by our laws to be considered as slaves, but as freemen. These laws the court must administer, and not the laws of Spain. Our national policy, perhaps our safety, requires that there should be no increase of this species of population within our territory. The acts of Congress provide that, however brought here, they shall be set free, and sent back to their own native country. The Spanish and Portuguese claimants demand them as their property. We repel the claim, by asserting their right to liberty. The demand of restitution is inconsistent with our policy, as declared in our statutes and other 72*] *public acts.[1] These declarations gave fair warning to those engaged in the slave trade, that though we did not intend to interfere with them on the high seas, yet, if their victims should come within the reach of our laws, we should protect them. These acts constitute a solemn pledge to all nations interested in the suppressions of this inhuman traffic, and to Africa herself, that if the objects of it should seek our protection, where they may lawfully receive it, within our territorial jurisdiction, and at the feet of our tribunals of justice, they should be entitled to that protection. Therefore, admitting the facts as alleged by the claimants, what they claim as justice in a matter of property, cannot be done to them, without disregarding our own policy, endangering our own safety, infringing our own laws, and violating the plighted faith of the country.

But supposing they have a right to insist on restitution of their property, what proof ought to be required, and what proof do they give, of their proprietary interest? It is material, also, here to consider that those human beings, who are claimed as property, come into the jurisdiction of the court, not by any wrongful act of ours, but lawfully, providentially; and are to be treated just as if they were thrown upon our shore by a storm. The Spanish owners show, as proof of property, their previous possession; and the possessor of goods, it is said, is to be presumed the lawful owner. This is true as to goods, because they have universally and nec-
73*] essarily an *owner. But these are men, of whom it cannot be affirmed that they have universally and necessarily an owner. In some particular and excepted cases, depending upon the local law and usage, they may be the subjects of property and ownership: but by the law of nature all men are free. The presumption that even black men and Africans are slaves, is not a universal presumption. It would be manifestly unjust to throw the onus probandi upon them to prove their birthright. Whatever may have once been the condition of Africa, and of the African slave trade, the authentic information on this subject will show that it is now impossible to determine, by the fact of possession, whether the party has been lawfully acquired or not. There must be an overwhelming probability of the lawfulness of such acquisition, to raise such a presumption. This is instanced by the different presumptions allowed in different parts of our own country, in respect to this description of persons. In the southern states, there is the highest degree of probability, from universal practice and well-known law, that such persons are slaves. But in the northern states, the probability is just the contrary, and the presumption is reversed. And in the present state of the slave trade, Africans, in a slave ship on the high seas, are in no such circumstances as to raise a presumption that they are lawfully held in slavery. For if there be a permitted slave trade, there is also a prohibited slave trade; and the prohibition is much more extensive than the permission. *The claimants must, conse- [*74
quently, show something more than mere possession. They must show a law, making such persons property, and that they acquired them under such law. In order to maintain their title, they show the municipal law of Spain; but the operation of that law can only extend throughout the territory of Spain, and to Spanish vessels on the high seas. These persons are now within the jurisdiction of our conflicting law; and they are brought here without any violation of the sovereign rights of Spain. Our own law, which is in force here, must prevail over the law of Spain, which cannot have an extraterritorial operation. There is no reason of comity, or policy, or justice, which requires us to give effect to a foreign law conflicting with our own law on the same subject. Besides, the Spanish law is not only contrary to ours, but is inconsistent with the law of nature, which is a sufficient reason for maintaining the supremacy of our own code. If this municipal law of Spain were allowed to prevail against our law, in our own territory, and before our own courts, the same effect must be given to the law of every other country, under the same circumstances. If, instead of these Africans, there had been taken by the same illegal capture, Spanish slaves, from an Algerine corsair, and afterwards brought in the same manner into our ports, they might, upon the same principle, be reclaimed by the representative of Algiers, who could easily show that, by the law prevailing among the Barbary states, they were slaves.

The municipal law of Spain, then, is insufficient *to maintain the title set by the [75 claimants. They are driven to the necessity of invoking the aid of the law of nations, as sanctioning their asserted right to property in these human beings. But if the law of nations is silent upon this subject; if it neither sanctions nor forbids the traffic in African slaves; if it is municipal law alone which determines in what manner private property is acquired and lost, then the claimants have no law to stand upon in asserting their claim. Supposing, however, this idea not to be correct, it is incumbent on the claimants to show, positively, that the slave trade, as now practiced, has the sanction of the law of nations, as now understood by the civilized and Christian nations of the world. That it once had that sanction, may, perhaps, be admitted; but it must also be admitted that there was once a time when it had not that sanction. The permission began by general assent and usage. The King of Spain, in the preamble to his edict of 1817, admits that it was incorporated into the code of nations as an exception to the general principles on which that code is founded.[1] When the practice was adopted by the general, not universal assent, of civilized nations, it became a part of the law of nations. In the same manner, a general, and not a universal denunciation of the practice, is sufficient to make it cease to be a part of the law of nations. In the great moral and legal revolution which is now going on in the 76] world respecting this trade, the time must come when it will cease to have a legal existence by the universal concurrence of nations. In the meantime, the question must be discussed, as it arises under various circumstances, until we reach the desired period when the universal sentiment of the wise and the good shall become the rule of conduct sanctioned by authority capable of enforcing it. All the modifications and improvements in the modern law of nations have been gradually introduced. The writers upon that law explain the manner in which these changes have been made and sanctioned.[2] The documents to be laid before the court will show the present state of the world's opinion and practice upon this subject, and will prove that the time is at hand, if it has not already arrived, when the slave trade is not only forbidden by the concurrent voice of most nations, but is denounced and punished as a crime of the deepest die. This is shown by the declarations contained in the treaties of Paris and Ghent; by the acts and conferences at the congresses of Vienna, London, and Aix la Chapelle; by the treaties between Great Britain, and Spain, and Portugal; by the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain; and by the reports of the committees of the House of Commons, and the House of Representatives in Congress. We contend, then, that whatever was once the fact, this trade is now condemned by the general consent of nations, who have publicly 77] *and solemnly declared it to be unjust, inhuman and illegal. We insist, that absolute unanimity on this subject is unnecessary; that, as it was introduced, so it may be abolished, by general concurrence. This general concurrence may not authorize a court of justice to pronounce it a crime against all nations, so as to make it the duty of all to seek out and punish offenders, as in the case of piracy. No decision has yet gone that length, nor is it necessary in this case to contend for such a principle. But in a case where the Africans are lawfully brought before a court of the law of nations, and are claimed as property, by those who must be considered as actors in the cause, and who must, consequently, prove their title as alleged, the fair abstract question arises, and their claim may well be repudiated as founded in injustice and illegality.

The learned counsel here commented upon the different cases in England and this country, with the view of reconciling them, and showing that they were all consistent with the principle he maintained. In the cases of The Amedie,[3] The Fortuna,[4] and The Donna Marianna,[5] the ship and persons on board were lawfully brought into the custody of the court, either as being captured jure belli, or taken under circumstances which warranted a seizure as for a municipal offense. The claims were accordingly rejected, upon the ground of the unlawfulness of the trade. In the subsequent cases of The Louis,[6] and of Madrazo *v. Willes,[7] [*78 the original seizure was held to be unjustifiable, and consequently restitution was decreed. But none of the important principles settled in the other cases, are overruled in these cases, which turn exclusively upon the point that the wrong first done in the unlawful seizure must be redressed. In the case of La Jeune Eugenie,[8] the claim of a French subject was rejected, as being founded in a breach of the municipal law of his own country, and the subject-matter in controversy was delivered up, with the consent of the executive government of this country, to the sovereign of France, to be dealt with as he should think fit. All these latter cases show, that where the court has rightfully obtained possession of human beings, who are claimed as slaves, it will not restore them to their alleged proprietors, although it may not go so far as to punish those who are engaged in the trade, by the confiscation of the vehicle in which it is carried on.

But another view may be taken of this subject. The King of Spain, in his edict of 1817 (before referred to), informs us, that the slave trade originated in motives of humanity, and was intended to avoid the greater evils growing out of the barbarous state of the African continent. Suppose this to be a just representation, and that the trade formerly consisted merely in the transportation of persons who were slaves in Africa, to be slaves elsewhere; it is at last discovered, by the *evidence tak- [*79 en before the British House of Commons in 1790, by the investigations of the African Institution, and by the reports of the British and American naval officers, to have entirely changed its character. Slaves are no longer acquired merely by capture in war, or by trade; but free persons are seized and carried off by the traders and their agents. Wars are instigated by them, for the mere purpose of making slaves. The persons thus enslaved are clandestinely brought away, under circumstances of extreme cruelty, aggravated by the necessity of concealment, and smuggled into every country where the cupidity of avarice creates a demand for these unhappy victims. May it not be asked, is this trade? Is it lawful? Has it not so changed its nature as to have become prohibited?

Again; supposing the slave trade not yet to have become generally illegal; still it has become so to the subjects of those countries who have issued declarations against the trade. To such the argumentum ad hominem may be fairly applied, as Sir W. Scott says in The Louis. Spain and Portugal are among the countries who have issued the most formal declarations against this trade, although they have not yet taken the most effectual measures to suppress it. By the treaties between these powers and Great Britain, they have stipulated the entire abolition of the slave trade north of the equator. But their authentic declarations pronounce it to be unlawful and inhuman, wherever carried on; and the permission to continue it south of the line can 80*] only *affect them, and their subjects, and the powers with whom they have made such treaties. Their subjects cannot avail themselves of the permission, so far as other nations are concerned. Those nations have a right to look to the declarations as authentic evidence of the understanding of the Spanish and Portuguese governments, as to the law of nations.

But suppose they can avail themselves of the permission to trade in slaves within the limits prescribed by the treaties. The onus probandi is thrown upon them to bring themselves within those limits. This they have failed to do by satisfactory evidence.

And even if the law was in their favor, and they had shown the trade in which they were engaged to be within the limits permitted by the treaties, such a general claim could not be given in by the consuls of Spain and Portugal for their fellow-subjects. The court has a right to the oath of the individual owners, as to their proprietary interest, and to explain the other circumstances of the case. As to the Portuguese claim, the owners are still unknown, and it is impossible that restitution can be made to the consul, or even to his government, merely upon evidence that the Africans were taken from a vessel sailing under the Portuguese flag and papers, without any specific proof of the individual proprietary interest.

Lastly; if some of those Africans were the property of the claimants, some were not; and, failing to identify their own, they are not enti- 81*] tled *to restitution of any as slaves, since among them may be included some who are entitled to their freedom. The proof, by lot, which was substituted by the court below for ordinary legal proof, is not satisfactory, especially where a claim to freedom conflicts with a claim to property.

Mr. Berrien, for the respondents, stated that a reference to the transcript would show, that of all the parties to this cause in the court below, the United States, and the Spanish and Portuguese vice-consuls, are alone before this court; and that the United States, acquiescing in all the residue of the decree, have appealed from only so much as directs restitution to the Spanish and Portuguese vice-consuls.

The allowance of these claims is resisted on various grounds.

One prominent proposition pervades the whole of the opposite argument. Unless we can meet and resist it, we must submit to be its 272 victims. It asserts, that the United States have acquired the possession of these negroes lawfully, without wrong; that with the possession so acquired, they have incurred the obligation to protect them; that all presumptions are in favorem libertatis; and, whatever the laws of other countries may tolerate or ordain, having ourselves declared the slave trade to be contrary to the principles of humanity and justice, we are bound, prima facie, to hold that there can be no property in a human being.

*This proposition suggests the follow- [*82 ing inquiries:

1. Was the possession lawfully acquired?

2. If so, does the right which is asserted necessarily follow?

3. With a view to their own peculiar condition, can the United States exercise such a power?

1. The lawfulness of the possession will be determined by considering the capacity of the seizing officer to make the seizure, in connection with the liability of the thing seized.

The seizure was made by John Jackson, commander of the revenue cutter Dallas, belonging to the district of Georgia; and was made off the coast of Florida, while that was yet a province of Spain. The right of Captain Jackson must have resulted from the authority given by his commission, and the laws of the United States.[1]

It did not result from the act of 1799, providing for the establishment of revenue cutters; for this only authorizes them to board vessels on the coasts of their respective districts, or within four leagues thereof; nor from the acts forbidding the slave trade, for these are directed only against vessels of the United States, or foreign vessels intending to violate our laws by introducing negroes into the United States. The President is, indeed, authorized to employ the armed vessels of the United States, to cruise on the coasts of the United States, or territories thereof, or of *Africa, or elsewhere, and [*82 to instruct them to bring in all vessels found contravening those acts. But the laws of the United States can operate only on American vessels, on American citizens on board of foreign vessels, or on such vessels within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States. Besides, it is not pretended that the revenue cutter Dallas had been selected as a cruising vessel under these acts, or that Captain Jackson had received any instructions from the President of the United States. Neither can the seizor derive any aid from the acts to preserve the neutral relations of the United States; for although the courts of the United States will restore property taken in violation of these acts, when it is found within their jurisdiction, yet they do not authorize the cruisers of the United States to rove the ocean in search of objects on which that jurisdiction may be exercised.

So far, then, as it depends on the official character of the seizor, the act was lawless.

The thing seized was a Spanish vessel, in the possession of persons, some of whom were American citizens, who had captured it jure belli, under the flag of Artegas, or of Venezuela, and in a vessel which had been fitted out, or whose armament had been increased, in the United States.

1.—The Louis, 2 Dodson's Rep. 238.

The right to seize for a violation of the acts to preserve the neutral relations of the United States, has been already spoken of; but the adverse argument considers these captors as pirates, and asserts the right of every individual 84*] to war *against them as enemies of the human race. The answer is,

1. The seizure by Captain Jackson was not made on that ground. The libel alleges the seizure to have been made for a violation of the act of 1818, prohibiting the slave trade.

2. The courts of the United States have declined to decide that such an act would amount to piracy.

3. To put himself in a situation to make this seizure, Captain Jackson abandoned the duty enjoined upon him by his commission, and the laws of the United States, by leaving the limits intrusted to his vigilance. If he had lost his vessel, could he have justified himself before a court-martial?

4. But if these men were pirates, and lawfully brought in, then the Spanish property was, from the moment of its introduction, under the protection of the ninth article of the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real.

Neither have the United States acquired any rights to enforce against these foreigners their own speculative notions on this subject, in consequence of their being actors. All parties are actors in a court of admiralty, and these parties only became so after their property had been taken into the custody of the marshal, and at the suit of the United States. But they were entitled, under the treaty, to have restitution of their property, without being put to other proof than that it was found in their possession.

2. If the possession had been lawfully ac- 85*] quired, *could the court refuse restitution on the ground suggested?

The great case on this subject, is that of The Louis.[1] Our adversaries agree to refer the question to its decision.

It is a singular mistake, to suppose that Sir W. Scott directed restitution solely on the ground of the unlawfulness of the seizure; and thence to infer, that if the seizure had been lawful, he would have condemned. On the contrary, admitting the lawfulness of the seizure, he decides expressly that restitution must, notwithstanding, be awarded.

3. With a view to their own peculiar situation, could the United States maintain the doctrines contended for? It is said, that, having promulgated our policy in relation to this subject, we have thereby given a warning to slave traders, which they are bound to respect—a pledge to the rest of the world which we are bound to redeem. But what is this policy, which we have thus notified to the world? It is to be found in our laws, inhibiting the slave trade. The penalties of these are denounced against our own vessels, and our own citizens, who shall engage in this traffic anywhere; and against foreigners and their vessels, who pursue it for the purpose of introducing negroes into the United States. There is no warning to the subjects of Spain and Portugal, quietly pursuing this traffic under the sanction of their own laws.

86*] *The notion of the pledge is equally visionary. I find it difficult to form a conception of a pledge, which the party making it can at any time capriciously recall; and yet no one doubts that an act of the American Congress can, at any moment, throw open the slave trade.

These considerations apart, would it become the United States to assume to themselves the character of censors of the morals of the world on this subject; to realize the lofty conception of the adverse counsel, and consider themselves as the ministers of heaven, called to wipe out from among the nations the stain of this iniquity? Might not the foreign claimant thus rebuke them, in the strong language of truth? For more than thirty years you were slave traders; you are still extensively slave owners. If the slave trade be robbery, you were robbers, and are yet clinging to your plunder. For more than twenty years this traffic was protected by your constitution, exempted from the whole force of your legislative power; its fruits yet lay at the foundation of that compact. The principle by which you continue to enjoy them, as protected by that constitution, forms a basis for your representatives, is infused into your laws, and mingles itself with all the sources of authority. Relieve yourselves from these absurdities, before you assume the right of sitting in judgment on the morality of other nations. But this you cannot do. Paradoxical as it may appear, they constitute the very bond of your union. The shield of your constitution protects them from your touch.

The learned counsel here proceeded to examine the evidence of proprietary interest, and insisted that (besides the other testimony) the official interposition of the Portuguese government supplied the place of proof of individual interest, and established the legality of the traffic.[3]

The objection to the decree of the Circuit Court, on the ground that the distribution of the negroes was directed to be made by lot, was answered by the following considerations:

1. It appearing that the negroes found on board the Antelope consisted of three distinct parcels, taken from American, Spanish, and Portuguese vessels, the obligation to protect the former was equal to, and not greater than, that which required the restoration of the latter. The capture by Smith being considered, as in the argument of our adversaries it is considered, as piratical, the right of the Spanish claimant to restoration under the treaty was the primary right, as founded on the treaty which is the supreme law; and in the fair construction of that treaty, it extended to everything found on board the Spanish vessel. Then the proof which should diminish that right was to be furnished by those who sought to diminish it.

*2. It being ascertained that these ne- [*88 groes were property, they were liable to distribution as other property; and, notwithstanding the assertion to the contrary, the lot is often and legally resorted to, to separate undivided interests.

3. As between the Spanish and Portuguese claimants, no question on this point can arise here, because they have not appealed.

4. The United States cannot question this part of the decree, because they have not only not appealed from it, but have actually proceeded to enforce it ex parte, and have received restitution by lot of the negroes taken from the American vessel.

The United States have, then, derived no right to refuse restitution, from the manner in which they have acquired possession.

They are not entitled, by law, or the stipulations of treaty, to apply their speculative notions of morality to the subjects of Spain and Portugal.

They have ill-grounded pretensions in reference to this ill-fated subject, to set themselves up as the moral censors of the civilized world. Here is evidence of a proprietary interest to satisfy the mind beyond a reasonable doubt, and it is wholly uncontradicted; and the passport of the King of Spain, and the interposition of the government of Portugal, show, if any necessity for it, the legality of the traffic, as to their respective subjects.

On what ground, then, is restitution refused? 89*] *It is said, the slave trade is unlawful, contrary to the principles of justice and humanity, and that no right can be derived from so nefarious a traffic.

Our inquiry is, by what law, which this court is competent to enforce, is it inhibited?

1. Is it contrary to the law of nations?

2. Is it contrary to the laws of the sovereigns of the claimants; and can this court refuse restitution for that cause?

3. Is it contrary to the laws of the United States; and can those laws be enforced against these claimants?

1. What is the slave trade, considered as a subject on which the law of nations can operate. Slavery exists, and has from all time existed, in Africa, and in many other countries. Where it exists, there will, of course, be an interior traffic in slaves, which the law of nations cannot touch. It is only on the transportation of negroes between two countries mutually tolerating slavery, that this operation is contended for. But this transportation is but an incident to the original sin of slavery. If humanity nerves the arm of the law, why is its force spent on the incident? Why is it powerless in relation to the principal wrong?

If the traffic in slaves be considered as increasing the number of victims, by affording a market for them, what is it then but an aggression by the subjects of one nation on the rights of another? If the nation forbids it, the offender is punished by the municipal law; if the 90*] nation *permits it, she herself becomes the aggressor. In either case, how does it concern other nations?

The law of nations may be defined to be a collection of rules deduced from natural reason, as that is interpreted by those who adopt them, and resting in usage, or established by compact, for regulating the intercourse of nations with each other.

Rights and obligations are interior between sovereign and people, and are regulated by the municipal law; or exterior, between nations considered as moral persons; and these are regulated by the law of nations.

Now, the slave trade is not contrary to the natural law of nations, because, until recently, it was universally tolerated and encouraged. It is not contrary to the positive law of nations, because there is no general compact inhibiting it; and nothing is more certain, than that the usage, or compact, even of a majority of nations, cannot produce rights or obligations among others. To what other evidences of the law of nations can we resort, except those of usage and compact; the former interpreting the rules of natural reason, the latter stipulating those of positive institution?

From this general view, it would seem that the slave trade is untouched by the law of nations. Let us render our inquiries more particular.

Is this traffic considered to be contrary to the law of nations, by the statesmen and jurists of Europe and America?

*We are all aware of the conferences [*91 of the European powers on this subject, at Vienna, at Aix la Chapelle, and at London. But all the efforts of Great Britain to have it so denounced were ineffectual. The marginal references point to the answers of the several powers respectively, and to the note and the answer of Lord Castlereagh; and all of them distinctly show that the inhibiting of this traffic finds no place in the code of international law.[1]

The reports of various committees of Congress in the United States, also clearly prove that, in the view of American statesmen, this traffic is not inhibited by the law of nations, since the object of them all is to devise means by which it may be so inhibited.[2]

After all, these conferences are only valuable as evidence of opinion, since they could not effect any change in the law of nations. On this subject the opinion of Sir W. Scott is distinctly expressed, in the case of The Louis.[3]

Among jurists, we find the judges of the K. B. in England, denying that the slave trade is contrary to the law of nations.[4]

And the same doctrine is announced by Sir W. Scott, after the most elaborate investigation, in the case of The Louis.[5]

*The only opposing cases are those of [*92 The Amedie[6] and La Jeune Eugenie.[7]

And, first, of The Amedie. It is most obvious that this case has not been considered by the statesmen of Europe as establishing the doctrine contended for. The conferences to which we have just referred, look to a general compact among nations as the only mode by which this traffic can be inhibited, and proposed, by general suffrage, to declare it piracy, admitting, at the same time, that their views may be defeated by the refusal of any one state. But if the British ministry had so considered this case, they would most surely have availed themselves of it in these conferences. That it was not so viewed by Sir W. Scott is most certain; or, bound as his judicial conscience was by the decision of the Court of Appeals, he could not have pronounced the opinion given in the case of The Louis. The argument in the case of The Amedie is founded entirely on the effect of the British act of Parliament. Before the passing of that act, the learned judge declares, that no court in England could have pronounced the slave trade to be illegal; since it is prima facie illegal everywhere, and on principles of universal law a claimant is not entitle to be heard in any court. We inquire,

1. If, before the enactment of the British act of Parliament, the slave trade was not forbidden, how that act could have changed the uni-93*] versal law? It is said, that that act, proprio vigore, rendered it, prima facie, illegal everywhere, incapable abstractly of having a legal existence. Are these not mere caballistic terms, too occult for the apprehension of a legal mind?

Consider the operation ascribed to this act of Parliament. Jurisdiction, derived from place, is confined to the territory of the sovereign, from the person, to his own subjects; but here is an act of the British Parliament, which, according to Sir Wm. Grant, operates locally throughout all space, and personally over every individual in the various communities of nations. Sir W. Scott holds a doctrine directly opposite to this, in the case so often cited.[1] It did not arise from the locality of the tribunal, for it was solemnly held, in the case of The Maria[2] (the Swedish convoy), that this could not influence its decisions.

2. By what rule, other than that of sic volo, sic jubeo, did the master of the rolls throw the burthen of proof on the claimants? It is said, because the slave trade is illegal, contrary to justice and humanity; that human beings are not the subjects of property. The obvious answer is, this is a petitio principii. It assumes the very question in controversy. The case admits, and so the fact was, that up to the time when this act was passed, with the exception of America, this traffic was everywhere lawful; 94*] that property *was acquired by it. If at that time it had become otherwise, the change must have been effected by some positive act. The assertion that such an act existed, was an affirmative proposition. He who made it was bound to prove it. Such is the opinion of Sir W. Scott, and of Sir. J. M'Intosh.[3] Nay, in the case of La Jeune Eugenie, it is admitted that a prohibitory act of the country of which the claimant is a subject must concur with the general law of nations, to authorize the forfeiture. Now, if the onus be on the claimant, it is certainly not necessary for the libelant to show a prohibitory act; all that in such case is essential is, that the claimant should fail to prove a permissive one. The opinion of Sir W. Scott, in relation to this case, will be found in The Fortuna, The Diana and The Louis.[4]

3. How can even the rigid rule laid down by that court be availed of? The court expressly decline to decide what will be the effect of the proof, it made, declaring that a claimant, under such circumstances, is not entitled to be heard in any court.[5] Of what avail, then, is the proof?

4. I find a difficulty in understanding what principles of the law of nations are not general in their operation, and yet the inhibition of the slave trade is said not to be one of the general principles of that law.

5. The argument seems to me to be self-destructive. *It admits that this novel [*95 principle cannot be enforced against the subjects of those nations whose municipal regulations permit it. One of two things seems to follow. Either the slave trade is not contrary to the law of nations, or the municipal law may permit what the law of nations forbids. Can any single nation control the universal law? strike piracy from the law of nations? or deprive a belligerent of the rights of contraband, or of blockage? The learned judge, in the case of La Jeune Eugenie, thus solves this difficulty: If a nation permits this traffic, the wrong is confined to the nation injured; and other nations are neither bound nor permitted to interfere. But the question recurs, what is the consequence, if a nation inhibit it? The offense must be against the power inhibiting, not, surely, against other nations, who, ex concessis, had no power either to inhibit or to permit. On this point, also, we are fortified by the opinion of Sir W. Scott.[6]

The case of The Amedie may, then, we think, be considered as an experiment; a trial of the legal intelligence of Europe and America, and affords no safe guide for the decisions of this tribunal.

It is obvious to remark, that the case of La Jeune Eugenie is referred to by our adversaries under circumstances of some singularity. The principles advanced by the learned judge, in delivering his opinion in that case, are maintained *by our opponents, while they [*96 revolt from the conclusion to which those principles conducted him. What we ask in this case, is precisely what was done in the case of La Jeune Eugenie, that the property should be restored to the consular agents of Spain and Portugal; and yet that very case is relied upon as an authority against this concession.

The proposition, that the slave trade is inconsistent with the law of nations, is maintained on the following, among other grounds, in the case of Le Jeune Eugenie:

1. Its accumulated wrongs, and consequent inconsistency with that code.

"It is of this traffic, in the aggregate of its accumulated wrongs, that I would ask," says the learned judge, "if it can be consistent with the law of nations?"

To us, the inquiry seems to be vain and nugatory. The gravamen of the question is equally applicable to any other act of atrocity, and to any other code of laws. Murder, robbery, etc., etc., are attended with accumulated wrong. They, too, are inconsistent with the principles of justice and humanity, which lay at the foundation of international law. Do the laws which forbid these crimes, therefore, form part of that universal law? are they governed by it, or punished by it?

2. Again, it is said, the law of nations is deduced from the general principles of right and justice; that whatever can be deduced from these principles as applicable to nations, 97*] and to the *nature of moral obligation, exists theoretically in the law of nations, and may be enforced.

It seems to us that nothing is gained by the first of these propositions. The principles of right and justice, it is most certain, are capable of being applied equally to the law of nations and to the municipal law; to nations and to individuals. But the question here is, whether, in their application to the concerns of individuals, by the act of one or more nations, or of any number less than the whole, they do not rather constitute a part of the municipal law of the nations applying them, than of the general law of nations.

The second proposition appears to us to be too broad. Without doubt, it is the right and duty of every nation to prohibit crimes, and among others this crime. It is entirely consistent with moral obligation that they should do so. What then? Is the act of a single nation, fulfilling this duty, less simply municipal, because the morality of the act which it performs is of universal obligation, equally affecting all nations?

3. It is urged, moreover, that the slave trade is in violation of some of the first principles which ought to govern nations. The assertion is unquestionable. But may not the same thing be said of many acts, which are confessedly the objects of municipal regulations alone? Smuggling often begins in perjury. It is prosecuted in violation of the duty of the citizen. Its tendency is to corrupt the morals of the community. It sometimes eventuates in murder. 98*] Is it an *offense cognizable by the law of nations as an infraction of that law?

For these reasons, we submit to the court that restitution cannot be refused on the ground that the slave trade is contrary to the law of nations.

2. Is the traffic contrary to the laws of Spain and Portugal; and can the court enforce those laws by refusing restitution?

1. The preceding arguments, the decision in The Louis, and even that of La Jeune Eugenie, are referred to, to prove that, as to this point, the burthen of proof is on the appellants. They must show a prohibitory act.

2. If the burthen of proof be with us, we have furnished the evidence. The royal passport, and the order of the Portuguese government, are decisive on this point. The sanction of the colonial Governor was considered sufficient in the case of The Diana.[1]

3. The laws of Spain and Portugal are merely municipal, and, from the very nature of their provisions, incapable of enforcement by the courts of the United States.[2]

4. Each sovereign has a right to the forfeiture, from the time of the commission of the act. He has the right of remission, and of pardon. Especially he has a right to decide, in his own tribunals, on the conduct of his own subjects, in relation to his own laws.[3] A monarch, or a nation, *stripped of these nec- [*99 essary attributes of sovereignty, would cease to be sovereign. The attempt by the United States to enforce these laws would be an usurpation.

3. Can this court apply the laws of the United States to this claim of foreign subjects?

1. The question has been answered in the preceding argument. The laws of the United States are strictly municipal, confined to citizens of the United States, to persons committing offenses on board vessels of the United States, to foreigners seeking to introduce negroes into the United States. The claimants are not within these provisions.

2. Though the law of the United States has made this traffic piracy, it has not, therefore, made it an offense against the law of nations. The jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States is exclusive for the punishment of this offense. Besides, no particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offenses punishable by the law of nations.[4]

Such, in the opinion of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty in England, is the only legitimate operation of the British act of Parliament on this subject.[5] Such, in the opinion of Congress, is the necessary limitation of ours.[6]

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, on the same side, insisted *that there was no evidence in the cause [100 which sustained the allegation that this vessel was found hovering on the coasts of the United States when she was seized; and if it were so, that would furnish no sufficient reason for refusing restitution to the Spanish and Portuguese claimants, who were unaffected by the misconduct of the piratical captors of their property.[7] Here the capturing vessel was illegally equipped in our ports, and the libelants have established their claim to the property in question under the laws of their own country. The original capture was not only made in violation of our neutrality, but was an act of piracy, and the duty of making restitution becomes imperative under the treaty with Spain. It appears from the treaties and edicts which have been referred to, that the slave trade was then tolerated by Spain and Portugal south of the equator; and, consequently, the presumption is, that Africans, obtained within the permitted limits, are legitimately held as slaves. This presumption is as strong as that which prevails in those states of the Union where slavery exists. None of the judicial decisions cited have gone the length of asserting that the nations who have prohibited the slave trade can compel others to join in that prohibition. The case of The Amedie itself, as explained by Sir W. Scott in the The Diana,[8] does not extend the principle by which the general prohibition 101] *is to be enforced in the courts of another country, to the case of claimants engaged in the trade permitted by the law of their own country.

Is, then, the slave trade contrary to the law of nations?

That law is a body of political ethics applied to nations. Not being reduced to a written code, we must seek for it in the elementary writings of publicists; in judicial precedents; and in general usage and practice.[1] Sir W. Scott adds to these ample sources the more limited and appropriate standard of ancient and admitted practice, not only by treaties, but by the laws, ordinances and formal transactions of civilized States.[2] The great men who drew up the report upon the Silesia loan, declare the law of nations to be "founded on justice, equity, convenience, and the reason of the thing, and confirmed by long usage."

As to the judicial precedents, they neutralize each other, if, indeed, the authority of the original case of The Amedie be not entirely subverted by that of Madrazo v. Willes, and the admirable judgment of Sir W. Scott in The Louis. To the new conventional law which is now attempted to be established in the world, the United States have not yet become parties. We cannot enforce the treaties between other powers, by which the African slave trade is 102*] denounced *as contrary to humanity and justice, and is prohibited to their subjects. No jurist has been cited, from the earliest to the most recent, who has pronounced the trade contrary to the positive law of nations. So that the court is left entirely to the light of reason in determining the question whether it be contrary to the law of nature, as properly applied to the conduct of nations and states.

If this prohibition be a part of the law of nations, it must be of the modern law of European nations. Are the United States parties to that law? And if they are, can they enforce its penal sanctions against other nations not parties to it?

Many principles have been at various periods asserted by confederacies of nations, which have ultimately failed to obtain a place in the general code of nations. The principles of the armed neutrality of 1780 were maintained by nearly all the powers of Europe against Great Britain alone; and yet her doctrines have not ceased to regulate the conduct of nations engaged in war. It is, at least, doubtful which is the true law of nations. The supposed inconsistency of the slave trade with the law of nature, will not alone condemn it in the view of a court of justice, so as to authorize all nations to treat it as a crime, or to enforce its prohibition by the confiscation of the property of those engaged in it. It becomes all reflecting men to think seriously, and speak cautiously, on the subject of the illegality of a trade which was once universally participated in by the civilized nations of Europe and 103*] America. This *fact is avowed by all the speakers on both sides of the abolition question, in the British Parliament. It is matter of notorious history, that both in ancient and modern Europe, the condition of slavery, and the commerce in slaves, were sanctioned by the universal practice, and law of nations.[3] The very definition of slavery in the civil law, which has been copied by writers on public law, shows that it was an institution established by positive law, against the law of nature: Servitus est constitutio juris gentium, qua quis dominio alieno contra naturam subjicitur.[4] The old common law writers are full of the subject of villeinage, which, it is well known, was not abolished in England until after the period when the African slave trade commenced. The offense of vagrancy was punished with slavery by the statute, 1 Edw. VI. c. 3.[5] The first case relating to the African slave trade, is that of Butts v. Pen, determined in the 29th of Charles II., being trover for negroes. The special verdict found that they were usually bought and sold in India.[6] In a subsequent case, trover was brought for a negro in England. Holt, C. J., said that trespass was the kind of action, but that trover *would lie, "if the sale was in Vir- [*104 ginia." Other cases turn upon questions as to the form of action, but they all concur in establishing the right to this species of property.[7] In 1689, all the judges of England, with the eminent men who then filled the offices of Attorney and Solicitor-General, concurred in opinion, that negroes were "merchandise," within the general terms of the navigation act.[8] The famous case of Somerset,[9] whilst it determined that negroes could not be held as slaves in England, recognized the existence of slavery in the colonies, as does the whole legal policy, both of that country and of France.[10] The slave trade was long the subject of negotiations, treaties, and wars, between different European states, all of which consider it as a lawful commerce. The very declarations in the recent European congresses, and the negotiations between Great Britain and the United States, all show that the slave trade has not yet been prohibited by anything like the unanimous consent of nations, so as to make it absolutely unlawful in the view of a court of the law of nations.

The United States have done all in their power, consistently with their constitution, to abolish the trade. But they have sought to abolish it by municipal means only. They have prohibited it to their own citizens, not only by the ordinary *penal sanctions [*105 of revenue and trade laws; but they have made it a criminal offense, and punished it as piracy. No treaty has yet been ratified with any foreign power, by which they engage to co-operate with the United States in the prohibition; and yet the court is called on to anticipate, by judicial legislation, the exercise of the treaty-making power, and to refuse restitution to the subjects of Spain and Portugal, of that which they claim as their property, under the laws of their own country. This property has been brought into our jurisdiction in consequence of its having been taken from the possession of the original owners, by armaments fitted out in our ports in viclation of our neutrality. The duty of restitution is therefore plain, under the laws and treaties of the Union, and the uniform decisions of this court.

The learned counsel also entered into a minute and elaborate examination of the proofs of proprietary interest, and reiterated many of the grounds of argument insisted on by his associate. But as they have been already fully stated in the report of Mr. Berrien's argument, it has not been thought necessary to repeat them.

The Attorney-General, for the appellants, in reply, answered the objection, that the only question presented by the pleadings, on the part of the United States, was, whether this was a trade in breach of the slave trade acts? He insisted, that as the libels filed by the Spanish and Portuguese consuls, demanded 106*] restitution upon the *ground of the illegal armament in our ports, and the claim, or defensive allegation, given in by the United States, resisted that demand upon two specific grounds: (1st) That the Africans were taken on board with intent to import the same, etc.; and (2d) that the vessel was found hovering on the coast with the same persons on board. If the testimony disclosed a case on which it would be proper for the United States to interpose, which was not reached by the pleadings, the consequence would be, not that the decrees should be affirmed, but that the cause would be remanded, with directions to amend. And, supposing the United States to have made no case by their pleadings, the question was, have the libelants made a case which justifies the decree? The Africans are parties to the cause, at least such of them as are free; and even if the other parties had colluded to make a case for restitution, they would still have been entitled to the protection of the court.

As to the seizure by the revenue cutter, he insisted that it was justifiable under the slave trade act of the 2d of March, 1807, s. 7, which forfeits "any ship or vessel found hovering on the coast of the United States, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with intent to land the same in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States." This act made no distinction as to the national character of the ship, whether it belonged to citizens or foreigners. So, also, the act of the 15th of May, 1820, c. 113, s. 5, makes the slave 107*] trade *piracy, where it is carried on by citizens of the United States. So that, whether we regard the predicament of the vessel, or of the persons engaged in the transaction, the seizure was fully warranted by the laws applicable to the case. Captain Jackson performed only an act of duty in capturing and bringing in the vessel for adjudication.

The question, then, recurs, what was the condition of the Africans thus brought in, as defined by our laws; which must be the rule to guide the determination of the court. They are placed under the protection of those laws, and are, prima facie, free. On whom, then, is the onus probandi thrown. Being here rightfully, they are under the protection of our laws and courts of justice. No person can claim a right to take them from the custody of the court, and carry them away into slavery, but those who can prove them to be slaves; who can prove it by such evidence as ought alone to be held sufficient in a question of freedom or slavery. This view of the case settles the question of the burthen of proof. He who would seek to disturb the apparently rightful condition of things, assumes the burthen of proving his own right. This is the ordinary doctrine of the Court of Admiralty, if the seizure has been rightful, and the case is, prima facie, a case for condemnation. The onus probandi is thrown upon the claimant to prove his property, and his right to restitution. But, in the present case, the rule is peculiarly applicable, and the clearness and fullness of the *proof ought to be in [*108 proportion to the importance of the matter in controversy. The case is one of human liberty. The Africans stand before the court as if brought up before it upon a habeas corpus. Suppose them here, on such a process, asserting their freedom, and claiming your protection; what kind of proof would you exact from those who claim to hold them in slavery? Most certainly you would not demand inferior evidence to that which you require in a case of life or death. The witnesses must present themselves fairly before you. Their statements must be clear and consistent, and such as to command the confidence of the court. They must be sustained by the documentary evidence; and, where any doubt is left, the decision should be in favorum libertatis.

The claimants wish the court to consider this as a question exclusively between Spain on one side, and the United States on the other, in which these persons are to be considered as "effects," and "merchandise," taken by pirates, and as such liable to restitution under the stipulations of the treaty of 1795. But is the court at liberty so to consider them, under the laws of our own country? Some of them are confessedly free, because the decree has established the fact. Which of them are slaves, it is impossible to determine by any rule of evidence known to our practice. The claimants must prove their property; and this involves the necessity of proving that these persons are property. They must prove that they are property, and that they are *their property. Possession may be a [109 sufficient indicium of property, in those places where the local law makes a particular subject property. The local laws of some of the states, generally make persons of color, prima facie, slaves, and throw the burthen of proof upon them to show the contrary. But even in those states, the possession of a newly imported African would not be evidence of property. The question, therefore, recurs, is it enough to justify the court in delivering up these persons to the parties for whom they are claimed, to show a possession on the high seas? Is the mere possession of such persons a sufficient evidence of their slavery to justify it in restoring them as claimed? The question is not whether the cruisers of the United States have a right to seize a Spanish slave ship upon the high seas, bring her in for adjudication, and throw the burthen of proof of proprietary interest upon the claimants. Any such right of interference with foreign states, their subjects, or people, is disclaimed. But these people are here, in the custody of the court, without any invasion of the sovereignty of foreign nations on our part; for the piratical vessel, which took them out of other vessels sailing under Spanish and Portuguese colors, was not acting under the authority, or upon the responsibility of the United States. They are brought here by a seizure authorized by our own laws, and perfectly consistent with the sovereignty and independence of Spain and Portugal. The laws, under which they were 110] seized and brought in, declare *them to be entitled to their freedom. Can the court surrender them as slaves upon no other proof than mere naked possession? 'Is the possession of Africans, on the coast of Africa, sufficient evidence of title, per se, without connecting that possession with any law, international or municipal, to justify the court in taking an active part in consigning to slavery these persons, thus placed under its protection?

It is unnecessary for the United States to show that the possession was, prima facie, wrongful. The opposite parties, who call upon the active aid of the court to maintain that possession, must prove that it was rightful.

The real question, then, is, whether the mere possession, under such circumstances, is sufficient evidence of title, not as against the United States, but as against these Africans. The court will not shut their eyes to what is passing in the world. Such a possession may be evidence of title in some of the states of this Union, and in the European colonies. It might have been so formerly on the coast of Africa. But it is not so now, even under the municipal laws of Spain and Portugal. Both of these powers have prohibited the slave trade on the coast of Africa to the north of the line, since 1815. It was prohibited long before by the United States and Great Britain, on every part of the coast, and of the world. It has been prohibited by France, Holland, and all the principal maritime states of Europe. Under these circumstances, it is impossible for the court to say that possession on the coast 111*] of *Africa is so habitually found in connection with right, under the municipal laws of the country to which the vessel belongs, as to constitute prima facie evidence of property. The presumption ought rather to be reversed. The natives of Africa, however, imperfect may be their civilization, compose an independent nation. By the general law of nations, they are as free as the Spaniards, or the Portuguese. Hence, it may be seen that the mere possession of an African, claiming him as a slave, by a Spanish ship on the coast of Africa, would no more prove the African a slave, than the possession of a Spaniard, by an African ship on the coast of Spain, would prove the Spaniard a slave. The actual possessor must, therefore, show some other right than mere possession. The Spaniard alleges that it has been the practice of the civilized and Christian nations of Europe, to make slaves of the Africans for three centuries; and hence, that, by the law of nations, he has a right to make slaves of them. The African opens the volume of the law of nations, and shows that the foundations of that code are laid in justice and humanity, and that no legitimate right can grow out of a violation of these principles. If he is answered, that the trade had its origin in humane motives, he may well upbraid us for such a vindication. Nor does the existence of slavery in the United States form any excuse or palliation, for perpetuating, and extending the guilt and misery of the slave trade. Slavery was introduced among us, during our colonial state, against the solemn remonstrances *of [*112 our legislative assemblies. Free America did not introduce it. She led the way in measures for prohibiting the slave trade. The revolution which made us an independent nation, found slavery existing among us. It is a calamity entailed upon us by the commercial policy of the parent country.[1] There is no nation which has a right to reproach us with the supposed inconsistency of our endeavoring to extirpate the slave trade as carried on between Africa and America, whilst at the same time we are compelled to tolerate the existence of domestic slavery under our own municipal laws.

It may well be asked, whether Africa is without the pale of the law of nations. Are not Africans in their own country, under the protection of that law? If it be answered, that the condition of slavery has existed from time immemorial, growing out of the exercise of the rights of war, as understood and practiced in that barbarous country, it may be replied, that those very wars have been stimulated by the arts and avarice of the slave traders. This fact is shown by the most conclusive evidence, in the examinations before the House of Commons in 1791. It appears, also, by the more recent reports of the American and British naval officers, and the agents of the London African Institution, and American Colonization Society. Unless, therefore, the slave traders can derive a right, founded *upon wrong practiced at their insti- [*113 gation, this argument cannot avail them.

Their possession, then, derives no support from the law of nations. Supposing that by the municipal law of Spain these persons are slaves, whilst by your law they are free; being brought into this country without any trespass on the sovereign rights of Spain, is the court bound to restore them from comity? If the general law of nations binds us to do this, it also binds us to deliver up persons charged with crimes, or even with political offenses. But this is a principle which has been repudiated by all nations.[2] The stipulation in the Spanish treaty, by which we are bound to restore the ships and effects, or merchandise of Spanish subjects, when captured within our territorial jurisdiction, or by pirates on the high seas, does not apply. These Africans are claimants, since it rescued what they claim as their property, from the grasp of pirates. If the claimants had not interposed, the course of the court would have been obvious. The illegal and piratical capture by our citizens, gave them no rights; and even if it did, they instantly forfeited them under our laws, which they intended to violate. But the claimants demand restitution of the Africans found on board this vessel, alleging them to be their property, lawfully acquired on the coast of Africa, and piratically taken from them by the Arraganta. This demand is resisted by the government of the United States, upon the ground that the persons in question are not by our laws to be considered as slaves, but as freemen. These laws the court must administer, and not the laws of Spain. Our national policy, perhaps our safety, requires that there should be no increase of this species of population within our territory. The acts of Congress provide that, however brought here, they shall be set free, and sent back to their own native country. The Spanish and Portuguese claimants demand them as their property. We repel the claim, by asserting their right to liberty. The demand of restitution is inconsistent with our policy, as declared in our statutes and other 72*] *public acts.[1] These declarations gave fair warning to those engaged in the slave trade, that though we did not intend to interfere with them on the high seas, yet, if their victims should come within the reach of our laws, we should protect them. These acts constitute a solemn pledge to all nations interested in the suppressions of this inhuman traffic, and to Africa herself, that if the objects of it should seek our protection, where they may lawfully receive it, within our territorial jurisdiction, and at the feet of our tribunals of justice, they should be entitled to that protection. Therefore, admitting the facts as alleged by the claimants, what they claim as justice in a matter of property, cannot be done to them, without disregarding our own policy, endangering our own safety, infringing our own laws, and violating the plighted faith of the country.

But supposing they have a right to insist on restitution of their property, what proof ought to be required, and what proof do they give, of their proprietary interest? It is material, also, here to consider that those human beings, who are claimed as property, come into the jurisdiction of the court, not by any wrongful act of ours, but lawfully, providentially; and are to be treated just as if they were thrown upon our shore by a storm. The Spanish owners show, as proof of property, their previous possession; and the possessor of goods, it is said, is to be presumed the lawful owner. This is true as to goods, because they have universally and nec- 73*] essarily an *owner. But these are men, of whom it cannot be affirmed that they have universally and necessarily an owner. In some particular and excepted cases, depending upon the local law and usage, they may be the subjects of property and ownership; but by the law of nature all men are free. The presumption that even black men and Africans are slaves, is not a universal presumption. It would be manifestly unjust to throw the onus probandi upon them to prove their birthright. Whatever may have once been the condition of Africa, and of the African slave trade, the authentic information on this subject will show that it is now impossible to determine, by the fact of possession, whether the party has been lawfully acquired or not. There must be an overwhelming probability of the lawfulness of such acquisition, to raise such a presumption. This is instanced by the different presumptions allowed in different parts of our own country, in respect to this description of persons. In the southern states, there is the highest degree of probability, from universal practice and well-known law, that such persons are slaves. But in the northern states, the probability is just the contrary, and the presumption is reversed. And in the present state of the slave trade, Africans, in a slave ship on the high seas, are in no such circumstances as to raise a presumption that they are lawfully held in slavery. For if there be a permitted slave trade, there is also a prohibited slave trade; and the prohibition is much more extensive than the permission. *The claimants must, conse- [*74 quently, show something more than mere possession. They must show a law, making such persons property, and that they acquired them under such law. In order to maintain their title, they show the municipal law of Spain; but the operation of that law can only extend throughout the territory of Spain, and to Spanish vessels on the high seas. These persons are now within the jurisdiction of our conflicting law; and they are brought here without any violation of the sovereign rights of Spain. Our own law, which is in force here, must prevail over the law of Spain, which cannot have an extraterritorial operation. There is no reason of comity, or policy, or justice, which requires us to give effect to a foreign law conflicting with our own law on the same subject. Besides, the Spanish law is not only contrary to ours, but is inconsistent with the law of nature, which is a sufficient reason for maintaining the supremacy of our own code. If this municipal law of Spain were allowed to prevail against our law, in our own territory, and before our own courts, the same effect must be given to the law of every other country, under the same circumstances. If, instead of these Africans, there had been taken by the same illegal capture, Spanish slaves, from an Algerine corsair, and afterwards brought in the same manner into our ports, they might, upon the same principle, be reclaimed by the representative of Algiers, who could easily show that, by the law prevailing among the Barbary states, they were slaves.

The municipal law of Spain, then, is insufficient *to maintain the title set by the [75 claimants. They are driven to the necessity of invoking the aid of the law of nations, as sanctioning their asserted right to property in these human beings. But if the law of nations is silent upon this subject; if it neither sanctions nor forbids the traffic in African slaves; if it is municipal law alone which determines in what manner private property is acquired and lost, then the claimants have no law to stand upon in asserting their claim. Supposing, however, this idea not to be correct, it is incumbent on the claimants to show, positively, that the slave trade, as now practiced, has the sanction of the law of nations, as now understood by the civilized and Christian nations of the world. That it once had that sanction, may, perhaps, be admitted; but it must also be admitted that there was once a time when it had not that sanction. The permission began by general assent and usage. The King of Spain, in the preamble to his edict of 1817, admits that it was incorporated into the code of nations as an exception to the general principles on which that code is founded.[1] When the practice was adopted by the general, not universal assent, of civilized nations, it became a part of the law of nations. In the same manner, a general, and not a universal denunciation of the practice, is sufficient to make it cease to be a part of the law of nations. In the great moral and legal revolution which is now going on in the 76] world respecting this trade, the time must come when it will cease to have a legal existence by the universal concurrence of nations. In the meantime, the question must be discussed, as it arises under various circumstances, until we reach the desired period when the universal sentiment of the wise and the good shall become the rule of conduct sanctioned by authority capable of enforcing it. All the modifications and improvements in the modern law of nations have been gradually introduced. The writers upon that law explain the manner in which these changes have been made and sanctioned.[2] The documents to be laid before the court will show the present state of the world's opinion and practice upon this subject, and will prove that the time is at hand, if it has not already arrived, when the slave trade is not only forbidden by the concurrent voice of most nations, but is denounced and punished as a crime of the deepest die. This is shown by the declarations contained in the treaties of Paris and Ghent; by the acts and conferences at the congresses of Vienna, London, and Aix la Chapelle; by the treaties between Great Britain, and Spain, and Portugal; by the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain; and by the reports of the committees of the House of Commons, and the House of Representatives in Congress. We contend, then, that whatever was once the fact, this trade is now condemned by the general consent of nations, who have publicly 77] *and solemnly declared it to be unjust, inhuman and illegal. We insist, that absolute unanimity on this subject is unnecessary; that, as it was introduced, so it may be abolished, by general concurrence. This general concurrence may not authorize a court of justice to pronounce it a crime against all nations, so as to make it the duty of all to seek out and punish offenders, as in the case of piracy. No decision has yet gone that length, nor is it necessary in this case to contend for such a principle. But in a case where the Africans are lawfully brought before a court of the law of nations, and are claimed as property, by those who must be considered as actors in the cause, and who must, consequently, prove their title as alleged, the fair abstract question arises, and their claim may well be repudiated as founded in injustice and illegality.

The learned counsel here commented upon the different cases in England and this country, with the view of reconciling them, and showing that they were all consistent with the principle he maintained. In the cases of The Amedie,[3] The Fortuna,[4] and The Donna Marianna,[5] the ship and persons on board were lawfully brought into the custody of the court, either as being captured jure belli, or taken under circumstances which warranted a seizure as for a municipal offense. The claims were accordingly rejected, upon the ground of the unlawfulness of the trade. In the subsequent cases of The Louis,[6] and of Madrazo *v. Willes,[7] [*78 the original seizure was held to be unjustifiable, and consequently restitution was decreed. But none of the important principles settled in the other cases, are overruled in these cases, which turn exclusively upon the point that the wrong first done in the unlawful seizure must be redressed. In the case of La Jeune Eugenie,[8] the claim of a French subject was rejected, as being founded in a breach of the municipal law of his own country, and the subject-matter in controversy was delivered up, with the consent of the executive government of this country, to the sovereign of France, to be dealt with as he should think fit. All these latter cases show, that where the court has rightfully obtained possession of human beings, who are claimed as slaves, it will not restore them to their alleged proprietors, although it may not go so far as to punish those who are engaged in the trade, by the confiscation of the vehicle in which it is carried on.

But another view may be taken of this subject. The King of Spain, in his edict of 1817 (before referred to), informs us, that the slave trade originated in motives of humanity, and was intended to avoid the greater evils growing out of the barbarous state of the African continent. Suppose this to be a just representation, and that the trade formerly consisted merely in the transportation of persons who were slaves in Africa, to be slaves elsewhere; it is at last discovered, by the *evidence tak- [*79 en before the British House of Commons in 1790, by the investigations of the African Institution, and by the reports of the British and American naval officers, to have entirely changed its character. Slaves are no longer acquired merely by capture in war, or by trade; but free persons are seized and carried off by the traders and their agents. Wars are instigated by them, for the mere purpose of making slaves. The persons thus enslaved are clandestinely brought away, under circumstances of extreme cruelty, aggravated by the necessity of concealment, and smuggled into every country where the cupidity of avarice creates a demand for these unhappy victims. May it not be asked, is this trade? Is it lawful? Has it not so changed its nature as to have become prohibited?

Again; supposing the slave trade not yet to have become generally illegal; still it has become so to the subjects of those countries who have issued declarations against the trade. To such the argumentum ad hominem may be fairly applied, as Sir W. Scott says in The Louis. Spain and Portugal are among the countries who have issued the most formal declarations against this trade, although they have not yet taken the most effectual measures to suppress it. By the treaties between these powers and Great Britain, they have stipulated the entire abolition of the slave trade north of the equator. But their authentic declarations pronounce it to be unlawful and inhuman, wherever carried on; and the permission to continue it south of the line can 80*] only *affect them, and their subjects, and the powers with whom they have made such treaties. Their subjects cannot avail themselves of the permission, so far as other nations are concerned. Those nations have a right to look to the declarations as authentic evidence of the understanding of the Spanish and Portuguese governments, as to the law of nations.

But suppose they can avail themselves of the permission to trade in slaves within the limits prescribed by the treaties. The onus probandi is thrown upon them to bring themselves within those lmiits. This they have failed to do by satisfactory evidence.

And even if the law was in their favor, and they had shown the trade in which they were engaged to be within the limits permitted by the treaties, such a general claim could not be given in by the consuls of Spain and Portugal for their fellow-subjects. The court has a right to the oath of the individual owners, as to their proprietary interest, and to explain the other circumstances of the case. As to the Portuguese claim, the owners are still unknown, and it is impossible that restitution can be made to the consul, or even to his government, merely upon evidence that the Africans were taken from a vessel sailing under the Portuguese flag and papers, without any specific proof of the individual proprietary interest.

Lastly; if some of those Africans were the property of the claimants, some were not; and, failing to identify their own, they are not enti- 81*] tled *to restitution of any as slaves, since among them may be included some who are entitled to their freedom. The proof, by lot, which was substituted by the court below for ordinary legal proof, is not satisfactory, especially where a claim to freedom conflicts with a claim to property.

Mr. Berrien, for the respondents, stated that a reference to the transcript would show, that of all the parties to this cause in the court below, the United States, and the Spanish and Portuguese vice-consuls, are alone before this court; and that the United States, acquiescing in all the residue of the decree, have appealed from only so much as directs restitution to the Spanish and Portuguese vice-consuls.

The allowance of these claims is resisted on various grounds.

One prominent proposition pervades the whole of the opposite argument. Unless we can meet and resist it, we must submit to be its 272 victims. It asserts, that the United States have acquired the possession of these negroes lawfully, without wrong; that with the possession so acquired, they have incurred the obligation to protect them; that all presumptions are in favorem libertatis; and, whatever the laws of other countries may tolerate or ordain, having ourselves declared the slave trade to be contrary to the principles of humanity and justice, we are bound, prima facie, to hold that there can be no property in a human being.

*This proposition suggests the follow- [*82 ing inquiries:

1. Was the possession lawfully acquired?

2. If so, does the right which is asserted necessarily follow?

3. With a view to their own peculiar condition, can the United States exercise such a power?

1. The lawfulness of the possession will be determined by considering the capacity of the seizing officer to make the seizure, in connection with the liability of the thing seized.

The seizure was made by John Jackson, commander of the revenue cutter Dallas, belonging to the district of Georgia; and was made off the coast of Florida, while that was yet a province of Spain. The right of Captain Jackson must have resulted from the authority given by his commission, and the laws of the United States.[1]

It did not result from the act of 1799, providing for the establishment of revenue cutters; for this only authorizes them to board vessels on the coasts of their respective districts, or within four leagues thereof; nor from the acts forbidding the slave trade, for these are directed only against vessels of the United States, or foreign vessels intending to violate our laws by introducing negroes into the United States. The President is, indeed, authorized to employ the armed vessels of the United States, to cruise on the coasts of the United States, or territories thereof, or of *Africa, or elsewhere, and [*83 to instruct them to bring in all vessels found contravening those acts. But the laws of the United States can operate only on American vessels, on American citizens on board of foreign vessels, or on such vessels within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States. Besides, it is not pretended that the revenue cutter Dallas had been selected as a cruising vessel under these acts, or that Captain Jackson had received any instructions from the President of the United States. Neither can the seizor derive any aid from the acts to preserve the neutral relations of the United States; for although the courts of the United States will restore property taken in violation of these acts, when it is found within their jurisdiction, yet they do not authorize the cruisers of the United States to rove the ocean in search of objects on which that jurisdiction may be exercised.

So far, then, as it depends on the official character of the seizor, the act was lawless.

The thing seized was a Spanish vessel, in the possession of persons, some of whom were American citizens, who had captured it jure belli, under the flag of Artegas, or of Venezuela, and in a vessel which had been fitted out, or whose armament had been increased, in the United States.

1.—The Louis, 2 Dodson's Rep. 238.

The right to seize for a violation of the acts to preserve the neutral relations of the United States, has been already spoken of; but the adverse argument considers these captors as pirates, and asserts the right of every individual 84*] to war *against them as enemies of the human race. The answer is,

1. The seizure by Captain Jackson was not made on that ground. The libel alleges the seizure to have been made for a violation of the act of 1818, prohibiting the slave trade.

2. The courts of the United States have declined to decide that such an act would amount to piracy.

3. To put himself in a situation to make this seizure, Captain Jackson abandoned the duty enjoined upon him by his commission, and the laws of the United States, by leaving the limits intrusted to his vigilance. If he had lost his vessel, could he have justified himself before a court-martial?

4. But if these men were pirates, and lawfully brought in, then the Spanish property was, from the moment of its introduction, under the protection of the ninth article of the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real.

Neither have the United States acquired any rights to enforce against these foreigners their own speculative notions on this subject, in consequence of their being actors. All parties are actors in a court of admiralty, and these parties only became so after their property had been taken into the custody of the marshal, and at the suit of the United States. But they were entitled, under the treaty, to have restitution of their property, without being put to other proof than that it was found in their possession.

2. If the possession had been lawfully ac- 85*] quired, *could the court refuse restitution on the ground suggested?

The great case on this subject, is that of The Louis.[1] Our adversaries agree to refer the question to its decision.

It is a singular mistake, to suppose that Sir W. Scott directed restitution solely on the ground of the unlawfulness of the seizure; and thence to infer, that if the seizure had been lawful, he would have condemned. On the contrary, admitting the lawfulness of the seizure, he decides expressly that restitution must, notwithstanding, be awarded.

3. With a view to their own peculiar situation, could the United States maintain the doctrines contended for? It is said, that, having promulgated our policy in relation to this subject, we have thereby given a warning to slave traders, which they are bound to respect—a pledge to the rest of the world which we are bound to redeem. But what is this policy, which we have thus notified to the world? It is to be found in our laws, inhibiting the slave trade. The penalties of these are denounced against our own vessels, and our own citizens, who shall engage in this traffic anywhere; and against foreigners and their vessels, who pursue it for the purpose of introducing negroes into the United States. There is no warning to the subjects of Spain and Portugal, quietly pursuing this traffic under the sanction of their own laws.

86*] *The notion of the pledge is equally visionary. I find it difficult to form a conception of a pledge, which the party making it can at any time capriciously recall; and yet no one doubts that an act of the American Congress can, at any moment, throw open the slave trade.

These considerations apart, would it become the United States to assume to themselves the character of censors of the morals of the world on this subject; to realize the lofty conception of the adverse counsel, and consider themselves as the ministers of heaven, called to wipe out from among the nations the stain of this iniquity? Might not the foreign claimant thus rebuke them, in the strong language of truth? For more than thirty years you were slave traders; you are still extensively slave owners. If the slave trade be robbery, you were robbers, and are yet clinging to your plunder. For more than twenty years this traffic was protected by your constitution, exempted from the whole force of your legislative power; its fruits yet lay at the foundation of that compact. The principle by which you continue to enjoy them, as protected by that constitution, forms a basis for your representatives, is infused into your laws, and mingles itself with all the sources of authority. Relieve yourselves from these absurdities, before you assume the right of sitting in judgment on the morality of other nations. But this you cannot do. Paradoxical as it may appear, they constitute the very bond of your union. The shield of your constitution protects them from your touch.

The learned counsel here proceeded to examine the evidence of proprietary interest, and insisted that (besides the other testimony) the official interposition of the Portuguese government supplied the place of proof of individual interest, and established the legality of the traffic.[3]

The objection to the decree of the Circuit Court, on the ground that the distribution of the negroes was directed to be made by lot, was answered by the following considerations:

1. It appearing that the negroes found on board the Antelope consisted of three distinct parcels, taken from American, Spanish, and Portuguese vessels, the obligation to protect the former was equal to, and not greater than, that which required the restoration of the latter. The capture by Smith being considered, as in the argument of our adversaries it is considered, as piratical, the right of the Spanish claimant to restoration under the treaty was the primary right, as founded on the treaty which is the supreme law; and in the fair construction of that treaty, it extended to everything found on board the Spanish vessel. Then the proof which should diminish that right was to be furnished by those who sought to diminish it.

*2. It being ascertained that these ne- [*88 groes were property, they were liable to distribution as other property; and, notwithstanding the assertion to the contrary, the lot is often depositions, to prove a fact which is matter of general and public history. This long, and otherwise unaccountable absence, of any Portuguese claimant, furnishes irresistible testimony that no such claimant exists, and that the real owner belongs to some other nation, and feels the necessity of concealment.

An attempt has been made to supply this defect of testimony, by adducing a letter from the secretary to whose department the foreign relations of Portugal are supposed to be intrusted, suggesting the means of transporting to Portugal those slaves which may be in the possession of the vice-consul, as the property of his fellow-subjects. Allow to this document all the effect which can be claimed for it, and it can do no more than supply the want of 131*] an express power *from the owners of the slaves to receive them. It cannot be considered as ascertaining the owners, or as proving their property.

The difficulty, then, is not diminished by this paper. These Africans still remain unclaimed by the owner, or by any person professing to know the owner. They are rightfully taken from American citizens, and placed in possession of the law. No property whatever in them is shown. It is said, that possession, in a case of this description, is equivalent to property. Could this be conceded, who had the possession? From whom were they taken by the Arraganta? It is not alleged that they are the property of the crown, but of some individual. Who is that individual? No such person is shown to exist, and his existence, after such a lapse of time, cannot be presumed.

The libel, which claims them for persons entirely unknown, alleges a state of things which is prima facie evidence of an intent to violate the laws of the United States, by the commission of an act which, according to those laws, entitles these men to freedom. Nothing whatever can interpose to arrest the course of the law, but the title of the real proprietor. No such title appears, and every presumption is against its existence.

We think, then, that all the Africans, now in possession of the marshal of the district of Georgia, and under the control of the Circuit Court of the United States for that district, which were brought in with the Antelope, 132*] otherwise *called the General Ramirez, except those which may be designated as the property of the Spanish claimants, ought to be delivered up to the United States, to be disposed of according to law. So much of the sentence of the Circuit Court as is contrary to this opinion, is to be reversed, and the residue affirmed.

Decree.—This cause came on to be heard, etc. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that there is error in so much of the sentence and decree of the said Circuit Court, as directs the restitution to the Spanish claimant of the Africans in the proceedings mentioned, in the ratio which one hundred and sixty-six bears to the whole number of those which remained alive at the time of pronouncing the said decree; and also in so much thereof as directs restitution to the Portuguese claimant; and that so much of the said decree ought to be reversed, and it is hereby reversed and annulled. And this court, proceeding to give such decree as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, doth direct and order that the restitution to be made to the Spanish claimant, shall be according to the ratio which ninety-three (instead of one hundred and sixty-six) bears to the whole number, comprehending as well those originally on board the Antelope as those which were put on board that vessel by the captain of the Arraganta. After making the apportionment according to this ratio, and deducting from the number the ratable loss which must fall on the slaves to which the Spanish claimants were originally entitled, the residue *of the said ninety-three are [*133 to be delivered to the Spanish claimant, on the terms in the said decree mentioned; and all the remaining Africans are to be delivered to the United States, to be disposed of according to law; and the said decree of the said Circuit Court is, in all things not contrary to this decree, affirmed.

[Instance Court. Slave Trade Acts.]

THE PLATTSBURGH. Marino, Claimant.

A question of fact under the slave trade acts, as to a vessel claimed by a Spanish subject, as having been engaged in the trade under the laws of his own country, but proved to have been originally equipped in the United States for the voyage in question.

Under the slave trade act of 1794, c. 11, the forfeiture attaches where the original voyage is commenced in the United States; whether the vessel belong to citizens or foreigners, and whether the act is done suo jure, or by an agent for the benefit of another person who is not a citizen or resident of the United States.

Circumstances of a pretended transfer to a Spanish subject, and the commencement of a new voyage in a Spanish port, held not to be sufficient to break the continuity of the original adventure, and to avoid the forfeiture.

It is not necessary, to incur the forfeiture under the slave trade acts, that the equipments for the voyage should be completed. It is sufficient if any preparations are made for the unlawful purpose.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York.

This was a seizure of the schooner Plattsburgh, otherwise called the Maria Gertrudes, on the coast of Africa, made by the United States ship of war, the Cyane, in the year 1820. The *vessel was brought into the port [*134 of New York for adjudication, and a libel of information was filed in the District Court, under the acts of Congress of 1794, c. 11, and of 1800, c. 205, prohibiting the slave trade. A claim was given in on behalf of Juan Marino, a Spanish subject, and a resident merchant of St. Jago de Cuba. Upon the proofs taken, a decree of condemnation was pronounced in the District Court, which was affirmed in the Circuit Court pro forma, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Jones and Mr. Mayer[1] for the appellants, and by the Attorney-General for the respondents.[2] The argument turned principally upon the question of fact, as to the origin of the adventure in the United States, and the alleged subsequent transfer to a Spanish subject, so as to change the property, and break the continuity of the voyage. The same grounds of law were also insisted on by both parties, as in the argument of the preceding case of The Antelope; but, as the present cause was determined by the court exclusively upon the facts respecting the alleged sale and change of voyage, it has not been thought necessary to report the arguments of counsel.

This is a libel founded on the several acts of Congress for the prohibition of the slave trade, and contains various distinct allegations, and especially counts framed on the slave trade acts of 1794, ch. 11, and 1800, ch. 205. It is unnecessary to enter upon a minute examination of the pleadings, because the whole case turns upon the question, whether, in point of fact, the voyage was originally undertaken from the United States, or was undertaken by the claimant, Mr. Marino, from the Island of Cuba, after a bona fide purchase made by him, altogether disconnected from the original enterprise.

The Plattsburgh was duly registered at Baltimore as an American vessel, owned by Messrs. Sheppard, D'Arcy & Didier, Jun., of that place, in October, 1817. She cleared out at the custom-house under the command of Captain Joseph F. Smith, in December, 1819, having what is called an assorted cargo on board, on a voyage ostensibly for St. Thomas, in the West Indies, but in reality, for St. Jago, in the Island of Cuba. Up to this period, the ownership remained upon the ship's papers wholly unchanged. But it is now asserted that the shares of D'Arcy and Didier were purchased by Sheppard for the sum of $6,000, and that the voyage was wholly undertaken on his account. The first remark which arises upon this state of the case is, how it should come to pass, if the purchase were bona fide, that the 136*] requisite alterations were not made *in the ship's papers, since, by the act of Congress, unless registered anew upon such sale, the vessel forfeits her American character. Sheppard, in his testimony, gives an extraordinary reason for the occurrence, declaring that he was insolvent at the time of the purchase, and so could not give the usual bond for the proper use and delivery up of the registry upon any future sale. Yet, according to his own showing, and that of the other part owners, he was, at this time, the owner of one-half of the Plattsburgh, valued at $6,000, and of an interest in another vessel, valued at $4,000. Sheppard further states that one of his inducements to purchase the Plattsburgh was an offer made to him by one George Stark (who became a conspicious character in the subsequent proceedings), to get for her $12,500, in St. Jago de Cuba, Stark asserting that he was authorized to purchase a vessel at that place. Accordingly, Sheppard determined to intrust Stark with the negotiation, and a bill of sale of the schooner was executed to Stark, by all the owners, to enable him to convey the same to any purchaser. The cargo of the Plattsburgh, as contained in the manifest, consisted principally of goods belonging to various shippers, who are not in the slightest degree implicated in any part of the guilt of this transaction; and upon the sales of the same at St. Jago de Cuba, the proceeds were regularly remitted to them. These shippers all contracted with Stark for the shipment and freight of their goods, and he informed one of *them that he had [*137 purchased the schooner for certain persons in the Island of Cuba, and that he had no interest in her himself, but was to receive $2,000 for delivering her at that port. How far this statement is reconcilable with the account given of the transaction by the owners of the Plattsburgh, it is unnecessary to examine.

At the time of the equipment of the Plattsburgh at Baltimore, there was another vessel, the brig Eros, which was also fitting out at that port for St. Jago de Cuba, with a cargo suited for the slave trade, under the management of Stark, as charterer for the voyage. This vessel was at first detained by the collector upon suspicion, but he, being satisfied, upon inquiry, that the owner of the Eros had no intention of having her engaged in the slave trade, afterwards released her, taking out some few of her equipments. The Plattsburgh first dropped down the Chesapeake Bay, and, afterwards (if the witnesses are to be believed), some grape, canister and round shot were taken on board, and, on stowing them away, a barrel of irons, or handcuffs, was discovered, which was not contained in the manifest of the cargo. The vessel then sailed down to New Point Comfort, and there waited ten or twelve days for the Eros, and as soon as the latter appeared, after taking on board Mr. Stark, the Plattsburgh sailed, in company with the Eros, directly for St. Jago de Cuba. The crew on board are represented to have distinctly understood, soon afterwards, that the voyage was designed ultimately for the African coast for slaves.

*In due time both vessels arrived at [138 the port of destination, and unladed their cargoes. And here the sale to Mr. Marino is alleged to have taken place, in entire good faith, for the sum of $12,000, although, upon the production of the bill of sale, the sum is there asserted to be $8,000 only. Both of the vessels are consigned to a Mr. Wanton, at St. Jago, through whom the negotiation seems to have been made. After the ostensible sale, the Plattsburgh underwent repairs under the agency of Wanton, and was in due form made a Spanish ship, with Spanish national documents; and the usual preparations were made, and the usual passports obtained, to equip her for a slave voyage to the coast of Africa, under her new owners. A part of the cargo of the Eros was taken on board of the Plattsburgh, and particularly about 300 casks of gunpowder. The original crew were, apparently, discharged, but Captain Smith, two of the mates, and six or eight of the men, together with Stark, still remained on board, and accompanied the vessel to the coast of Africa, she being, during that voyage, under the nominal command of a Mr. Gonzalez, with the assumed name of the Maria Gertrudes. She was captured, while lying on the coast of Africa, north of the line, by the boats of the United States ship of war Cyane, under Lieutenant Stringham, and was brought into the port of New York for adjudication, and was there finally condemned by the district and circuit courts; and the present appeal is 139] from *the decree pronounced, pro forma, by the latter.

Such is a general outline of the circumstances of the case, upon which it is material to observe, that if the original object of the equipment and voyage from Baltimore was for the purpose of carrying on the African slave trade, the forfeiture equally attaches, whether the schooner was then owned by American citizens, or by a foreigner. The act of 1794, ch. 11, expressly declares that no citizen or resident in the United States shall, for himself, or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor or owner, build, fit, equip, load or otherwise prepare, any vessel within any port of the United States, nor cause any vessel to sail from any port within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves, to any foreign country, etc., etc., under the penalty of forfeiture. Under this act, it is immaterial to whom the ownership belongs, and whether the act is done suo jure, or for the benefit of another person. If, therefore, the Plattsburgh was equipped at Baltimore by the owners, or by the master, or by Stark, as factor or agent, to carry on the slave trade for the benefit of Marino, the case falls directly within the prohibitions of the act. And, in this view, the declarations of Sheppard and Stark, respecting the sale, are not without considerable significance. But there is no pretense to say, upon the facts in proof, that the actual ownership, at the commencement of the voyage, was not in Sheppard and his partners, or in Stark. 140*] We *find the latter traveling with the vessel through all her subsequent wanderings, with a considerable cargo on board, which belonged to himself when she left Baltimore, and which was at St. Jago transhipped from the Eros; we find the original master, and mates, with efficient authority, on board, on the coast of Africa; we find all parties yielding obedience to them, and to Stark; we find the master resorting to subterfuges, and concealments, after the capture, and the log-book kept in the English language; and if the testimony of two of the crew is admitted (and one of them is not in the slightest degree discredited), we find the most decisive proofs that the original voyage was conceived and executed solely with a view to the slave trade. Whatever exceptions may be taken to the testimony of Ferver (and it is certainly open to much animadversion from his first prevarications), it has the merit of standing supported, as to its main facts, by all the other circumstances of the case. The natural, nay, the almost necessary inference from those circumstances is, that they belong to a meditated infringement of the acts prohibiting the slave trade.

It has been asked, in what manner the original intention can be deduced from the facts, since the Plattsburgh had on board an innocent cargo when she left Baltimore. That, however, is not quite certain, for though nothing noxious appeared on the face of the manifest, yet, if Ferver and Flower are believed, there was a barrel of handcuffs concealed in the run, demonstrating, in no *equivocal manner, [*141 the object of the parties. But, assuming that the equipments were all innocent in their own nature, that would not help the case, if there were positive proof of a guilty intention. The law does not proceed upon the notion that provisions or equipments which are adapted to ordinary voyages, are not within the forfeiting clause, if they are intended for carrying on the slave trade. Nor is it necessary that there should be complete equipments for this purpose. It is sufficient if any preparations are made for the unlawful purpose. Such was the doctrine of this court in the cases formerly adjudged, which were cited at the bar.[1]

But there is no pretense to separate the voyage of the Plattsburgh from that of the Eros. Both were undertaken by the same party, and for the same object. The Eros carried out the cargo adapted to carry on the traffic, and for the purpose of concealment, the Plattsburgh was made to assume the garb of innocence. It was an ingenious device to lull suspicions, and escape the penalties of the law; but the intention is just as strongly manifested as though all the offensive articles had been laden on board the Plattsburgh. In short, the Eros may be considered as the mere tender of the Plattsburgh, and subservient to all the objects of the latter. Her cargo found its way on board after the arrival at St. Jago, under the direction of Stark, who, true to his original purpose, remained with the Plattsburgh as the dux facti. *It is impossible, upon any reasonable [*142 grounds, to assume his intention to have been a purely lawful traffic at St. Jago. If it had been so, why should he have been found on board on the coast of Africa? Men do not, ordinarily, take upon themselves such an odious and dangerous post, surrounding themselves with penalties and suspicions, without causes deeply connected with their own private interest and purposes.

But we are told that here was a genuine sale to a Spaniard, who was authorized, by the laws of his country, to carry on the slave trade, and, however immoral or inhuman it may be, the court are to decide his case upon principles of law, and not merely upon principles of justice or morality. Certainly the court have nothing to do with the conscience of the Spanish claimant, if he has established a bona fide, legal ownership. But that is the very point in controversy. This is not the case of an ordinary trade, where no disguise is necessary or useful. It is the case of a trade prohibited to American citizens under very heavy penalties, penalties which have since been aggravated to the infliction of capital punishment. It is a trade odious in our country, and carries a permanent stain upon the reputation of all who are concerned in it, and is watched by the severest vigilance of the government. Under such circumstances, it is obvious that it cannot be carried on under our flag, but at the greatest hazards, and with few chances of escaping detection. If carried on at all, it must, therefore, 143*] *be carried on by Americans under the disguise of foreign flags; and it is notorious that, in the colonial ports of Spain, there is little difficulty in procuring all the apparatus for the use of the national flag. The existence of such flag is not, when circumstances of just suspicion occur, any decisive proof of innocence, for it is just such a cover as must accompany the fraud. And these considerations cannot fail to attract the attention of a bona fidei Spanish purchaser. He cannot but know that American cruisers are in search of those who violate our laws respecting this traffic; and he would deem it the highest imprudence to place his property in a situation in which it might justly be suspected of an admixture of American interests. He would studiously exclude from his ship all Americans, lest they should involve him in serious losses. Of course, he would, a fortiori, exclude from his employment the original American master and owner from whom he had purchased. He could not, without the grossest rashness, be presumed to forget that an American owner and master, on board of a vessel recently under their control, and recently purchased, would jeopard the whole adventure, for, upon the search of a cruiser, they would excite very strong presumptions of guilt. How, then, can we reconcile, with the notion of a bona fide purchase in this case, the continued employment of the owner, the master, the mates, and a large proportion of the crew, of the Plattsburgh? Does it not necessarily diminish the credibility of such a claim?

1.—The Emily and The Caroline, 9 Wheat. Rep. 381.

144*] *What, then, are the explanations attempted to be given upon this subject? It is said that Smith and Stark were employed by Wanton to go to the coast of Africa to transact business for him, and that they were mere passengers. But what business of Wanton? None is proved, or attempted to be proved. And who, in fact, is Wanton? He is the consignee of Stark, both for the Plattsburg and the Eros. He is the shipper of the cargo for the coast of Africa, and, upon the face of the bill of lading, no other person appears as owner; and it is now said, that he is what is called an actionist, or share-holder, in the voyage; and, by the Spanish laws, or course of trade, such persons do not appear as owners on the papers. It is remarkable, that if such be the law, Marino's name should not appear on the bill of lading, and that Wanton's alone is stated. The ambiguous fact is alleged that no freight is payable, because the vessel and cargo are united for the voyage. Surely it must have been in the power of the claimant to have given much more full and exact information on this point.

Then, as to Captain Smith's being a mere passenger, on which so much reliance is placed by the claimant, how does it comport with the facts upon the record? At the time of the capture he appeared as a principal personage, and evidently conducted himself differently from a person who had no interest in the voyage, and was a mere spectator. But what is decisive, to show that this is a mere disguise, 145*] too thin not to be *easily seen through, is the letter found on board, written by him, to the mate, a short time before the vessel sailed from St. Jago, in which the mask is stripped off, and he appears in his natural character as master. It is as follows: "Sir, I wish you to get the schooner down to Moro in the morning, and get the men quartered to the guns, and station them on the tops and forecastle, the same as on board armed ships, and get all ready for going to sea tomorrow night. After you get down to the Moro, send the boat, with four men, for me. Yours, Jos. Smith." Nothing can be more unlike the character or authority of a passenger, than these directions. They belong to one who has a right to command, and knows he is to be obeyed. The language imports a right to control the voyage, and could be dictated only by one in possession of the effective command. It would be absurd for an American passenger to address such a note to an American mate, who was responsible to a Spanish master for all his orders and conduct. It would be an exercise of credulity far beyond any just claims of the evidence to lead the court to the belief that Captain Smith was a mere passenger. The circumstances of the case are at war with the supposition, and the positive testimony of Ferver and Flower completely overturns it.

Without going more at large into the evidence, in which there is much matter open to observation, it is sufficient to state that, in the opinion of the court, the reality of the asserted sale to Marino is not established by the proofs, and our *conclusion is, that the unlaw- [*146 ful enterprise had its origin at Baltimore.

Decree affirmed with costs.

THOMAS, Appellant,

v.

GABRIELLE BROCKENBROUGH, John Harvie, Edwin Harvie, Jacqueline Harvie, Julia Ann Harvie, Heirs-at-law and Devisees of John Harvie, Respondents.

Although bills of review are not strictly within the statute of limitations, yet courts of equity will adopt the analogy of the statute in prescribing the time within which they shall be brought.

Appeals in equity causes being limited by the judiciary acts of 1789, c. 20, s. 22, and of 1803, c. 353, (XCIII.), s. 2, to five years after the decree, the same period of limitation is applied to bills of review.

Quære, Whether a bill of review, founded upon matter discovered since the decree, is also barred by the lapse of five years.

It is in the discretion of the court, to grant leave to file a bill of review for that cause.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

The appellant, Thomas, filed in that court, at the November term, 1818, a bill to review and reverse a final decree of the same court,

NOTE.—Limitation of actions in equity cases. In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, in the courts of law and equity, the statute of limitations applies equally to both courts, but it does not apply to cases in which courts of equity have exclusive jurisdiction. Hovenden v. Ld. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lefr. 607, 630; Tatam v. Williams, 3 Hare. 347. Bank of U. S. v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32; Sherwood v. Sutton, 5 Mas. 143; Pratt v. Northam, 5 Mas. 95; Union Bk. v. Stafford, 12 How. 327; Miller v. McIntyre, 6 Pet. 61; 1 McLean, 85; Coulson v. Walton, 9 Pet. 62; 1 McLean, 120; Lewis v. Marshall, 5 Pet. 470; McKnight v. Taylor, 17 Pet. 197; pronounced at the May term, 1810, by which the plaintiff in the bill of review, and defendant in the original suit, was decreed to convey 147*] *to the heirs of John Harvie, the plaintiffs in the original suit, a certain tract of land, which formed the subject of controversy in that suit. The bill of review, after stating the substance of the original bill, which was filed by John Harvie, and the bill of revivor, after his death, in the name of the present respondents, in whose favor the decree was passed, assigns the following errors in the said decree, as causes for its reversal:

1. That the entry of James Clark, under whom the said John Harvie claimed the land in dispute, was void for uncertainty.

2. That before the final decree was passed the said Harvie died, leaving a will, by which he devised the land in controversy to his sons, Edwin and Jacqueline, two of the plaintiffs in the bill of revivor, of which will the plaintiff was wholly ignorant until long after the final decree was entered.

3. That the said Edwin Harvie died previous to the said decree, and his right in the said land descended to his heirs-at-law, John and Lewis, who were no parties to the said suit, of which facts the plaintiff was wholly ignorant until long after the decree complained of.

To this bill of review, the defendants plead, in bar, the decree passed and enrolled in the original suit, and the prosecution by the plaintiff, Thomas, of a writ of error to the Supreme Court to reverse the same, which was dismissed, and then demurred to so much of the bill as sought to review and reverse the said decree. Upon argument of the plea and demurrer, the 148*] court below *dismissed the bill of review, and the cause was brought, by appeal, to this court.

Mr. Talbot, for the appellant, argued upon the merits of the original cause, to invalidate the title of the plaintiff in that cause, founded upon the entry of Clark; and, also, upon the other errors assigned in the bill of review. He insisted that there was no period of limitation to bills of review, by the act of Congress, and that, in this case, the bill of review being founded upon newly-discovered evidence, and having been permitted by the court below, in its discretion, to be filed, it must be determined by the error in the original decree. In England, it is usual to recite all the important facts of the cause in the decree. In this country, this is not done, and, therefore, the pleadings, exhibits and proofs must be resorted to, in order to discover the errors apparent upon the face of the original decree.

Mr. Bibb, contra, insisted that the first error assigned upon the merits of the original cause, was no ground for a bill of review. The errors in law must be apparent on the face of the decree. If a fact be mistaken at the hearing, and in the decretal order, it must be rectified by a rehearing, which rehearing cannot be after decree enrolled.[1] The other errors assigned did not prejudice the appellant, nor had he any interest in correcting them. But the conclusive *objection to the whole proceeding [*149 was, that here is an attempt by a bill of review to revise the original decree, after the appeal is barred by the limitation of five years, prescribed in the acts of Congress. In England, writs of error are limited by statute to twenty years, and the courts of equity have limited appeals, and bills of review, to the same period, by analogy to that statute.[2]

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The first error assigned in the bill of review involves the merits of the original cause, and was intended to induce a re-examination of the title of the plaintiffs in that cause, the validity of which had been established by the decree. But, previous to an investigation of that subject, a preliminary question has been suggested by the counsel for the appellee, which the court is called upon to consider. The record shows that the order of the court, permitting the bill to be filed, was granted eight years subsequent to the final decree in the original cause; and the question to be decided is, whether this remedy was not barred by length of time.

It must be admitted that bills of review are not strictly within any act of limitations prescribed by Congress; but it is unquestionable that *courts of equity, acting upon the [*150 principle that laches and neglect ought to be discountenanced, and that in cases of stale demands its aid ought not to be afforded, have always interposed some limitation to suits brought in those courts. It is stated by Lord Camden, in the case of Smith v. Clay, Ambl. 645; 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 639, note, "that as the court of equity has no legislative authority, it could not properly define the time of bar by a positive rule; but that as often as Parliament had limited the time of actions and remedies to a certain period in legal proceedings, the Court of Chancery adopted that rule, and applied it to similar cases in equity." Upon this principle it is, that an account for rents and profits, in a common case, is not carried beyond six years, or a redemption of mortgaged premises allowed after twenty years' possession by the mortgagee, or a bill of review entertained after twenty years, by analogy to the statute which limits writs of error to that period.

These principles seem to apply, with peculiar strength, to bills of review, in the courts of the United States, from the circumstances that Congress has thought proper to limit the time within which appeals may be taken in equity causes, thus creating an analogy between the two remedies, by appeal, and a bill of review, so apparent, that the court is constrained to consider the latter as necessarily comprehended within the equity of the provision respecting the former. For it is obvious that, if a bill of review to reverse a decree, on the ground of 151*] error apparent *on its face, may be filed at any period of time beyond the five years limited for an appeal, it will follow that an original decree may, in effect, be brought before the Supreme Court for re-examination, after the period prescribed by law for an immediate appeal from such decree, by appealing from the decree of the Circuit Court, upon the bill of review. In short, the party complaining of the original decree would, in this way, be permitted to do indirectly what the act of Congress has prohibited him from doing directly.

Whether a bill of review, founded upon matter discovered since the decree, is in like manner barred by the lapse of five years after such decree, is a question which need not be decided in the present case, since we are all of opinion that it is in the discretion of the court to grant leave to file a bill of review for that cause, and that such leave ought not to be granted in a case where it appears that the plaintiff is not aggrieved by the decree, on account of the error so assigned; or, that being granted, the court ought to dismiss the bill, where no other error is assigned.

In this case, the court below decided, in the original cause, that the title to the land in controversy was vested in the heirs of John Harvie, and decreed the appellant to convey the same to them.

If Thomas, then, had no title to the land, of what consequence was it to him that the conveyance was decreed to be made to all the complainants *in that cause, as being the [*152 heirs of Harvie, rather than to two of them, who, he alleged, were entitled to the land as devisees? If they did not complain of the decree (and that they did not, is proved by their plea and demurrer to the bill of review), and if the plaintiff in this bill was not injured by it, the court is at a loss to conceive upon what legal or equitable ground that decree could have been reversed for the errors growing out of the after discovered evidence. These observations apply equally to the second and third errors assigned.

Decree affirmed with costs.

[Chancery. Limitation. Local Law.]

ELMENDORF, Appellant, v. TAYLOR et al., Respondents.

Although the statutes of limitation do not apply, in terms, to courts of equity, yet the period of limitation which takes away a right of entry, or an action of ejectment, has been held by analogy to bar relief in equity, even where the period of limitation for a writ of right, or other real action, had not expired.

Where an adverse possession has continued for twenty years, it constitutes a complete bar in equity, wherever an ejectment would be barred if the plaintiff possessed a legal title.

The rule which requires all the parties in interest to be brought before the court, does not affect the jurisdiction, but is subject to the discretion of the court, and may be modified according to circumstances.

In the courts of the United States, wherever the case may be completely decided as between the litigant parties, an interest existing *in some [*153 other person, whom the process of the court cannot reach, as if such party be a resident of another state, will not prevent a decree upon the merits.

The courts of every government have the exclu-

This court respects the decisions of the state courts upon their local statutes, in the same manner as the state courts are bound by the decisions of this court in construing the constitution, laws and treaties of the Union.

In Kentucky, a survey must be presumed to be recorded at the expiration of three months from its date, and an entry dependent on it is entitled to all the notoriety of the survey as a matter of record.

An entry in the following words, "W. D. enters 8,000 acres, beginning at the most south-westwardly corner of D. R.'s survey of 8,000 acres, between Floyd's Fork and Bull Skin; thence along his westwardly line to the corner; thence the same course with J. K.'s line north 2° west, 964 poles, to a survey of J. L. for 22,000 acres; thence with Lewis's line, and from the beginning south 7° west till a line parallel with the first line will include the quantity," is a valid entry.

Such an entry is aided by the notoriety of the survey, which it calls to adjoin, where those surveys had been made three months anterior to its date.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This was a bill in equity, brought by the appellant, Elmendorf, in the court below, to obtain a conveyance of lands held by the respondents under a prior grant, and under entries which were all older than his entry. But the defendants below relied entirely on their patent; and the case, consequently, depended on the validity of the plaintiff's entry. This entry was made on the 19th of April, 1784; as follows: "Walker Daniel enters 8,000 acres, beginning at the most south-westwardly corner of Duncan Rose's survey of 8,000 acres, between Floyd's Fork and Bull Skin; thence [*154] along his westwardly line to the *corner; thence, the same course with Granville Smith's lower line, to John Lewis's corner; thence with Lewis's line, and from the beginning south 7° west, till a line parallel with the first will include the quantity." This entry was afterwards explained and amended on the 1st of July, 1784, so as to read as follows: "Walker Daniel enters 8,000 acres, beginning at the most south-westwardly corner of Duncan Rose's survey of 8,000 acres, between Floyd's Fork and Bull Skin; thence along his westwardly line to the corner; thence the same course with James Kemp's line north 2° west, 964 poles, to a survey of John Lewis for 22,000 acres; thence with Lewis's line, and from the beginning south 7° west, till a line parallel with the first line will include the quantity.

The plaintiff's bill was dismissed by the court below, and the cause brought by appeal to this court. It was argued, at a former term, by Mr. Clay and Mr. Talbot for the appellant, and by Mr. Bibb for the respondents, and was again argued at the present term by the same counsel.

On the part of the appellant, it was contended that the survey referred to in the amended entry, was, at the time, an object of sufficient notoriety to give validity to the entry, which called for one of its corners as a beginning. The land law of Virginia prescribes that surveys shall be returned to the office, and recorded in a record book, to be kept for that purpose by the principal surveyor, within three months from the time *of their being made. [*155 This survey had thus become a matter of record; and subsequent purchasers were bound to know its position, in the same manner as they are bound to know the position of entries. The book of surveys has every quality of a record, except that the surveyor is restrained from granting copies until the time limited by law for the return of surveys to the land-office has expired; and the notoriety attached to the record of survey does not entirely depend on the right to demand a copy of it. The right to inspect it still exists, and this right has been considered by the legislature as giving sufficient notice to all persons interested to enter a cavcat against the issuing of a patent. Were the question of novel impression, there could

NOTE.—Construction and effect of state laws and constitution, and state decisions in regard to same.

As to conflict between laws of the United States and laws of the states, see Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1,210; Amis v. Smith, 16 Pet. 303; Dobbins v. Erie County, 16 Pet. 435; Barbarie v. Eslava, 9 How. 421; Barbarie v. Mayor of Mobile, 9 How. 451; McGuire v. The Commonwealth, 3 Wall. 387.

As far as the decisions of the state courts settle the rules of property, they will be properly respected by the United States Supreme Court. But where the only effect of a state decision is to regulate the practice of the courts, and to determine what shall be a judgment, the Supreme Court cannot consider themselves bound by such decisions, upon the ground that the laws upon which they are made are local in their character. Amis v. Smith, 16 Pet. 303.

The laws of a state, regulating the proceedings of its own courts, cannot authorize a district or circuit court sitting in that state to depart from the modes of proceeding and rules prescribed by the acts of Congress. Kelsey v. Forsyth, 21 How. 5.

Rules of practice, in relation to the federal court, form a law arising under the constitution of the United States, and consequently are not subject to state regulation. Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash. C. The true construction of section 34 of the judiciary act of Sept. 24, 1789, is that the laws governing rights of persons, and rules of property, as settled in the states, shall be guides to the courts of the United States, in controversies depending before them. But this does not extend to rules of practice established in the states. U. S. v. Wonson; 1 Gall. 5, 18; Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash. C. C. 313; 5 Am. L. Journ. 502; Tobey v. Claflin, 3 Sumn. 379; Brown v. Van Braam, 3 Dall. 314.

Laws which relate to practice, process, or modes of proceeding before or after judgment, are exceptions to section 34 of the judiciary act of Sept. 24, 1789. Thompson v. Phillips, Baldw. 246.

Under sec. 34 of the judiciary act of Sept. 24, 1789, the existing statutes of a state, when applicable, must be considered in the same manner as if the words of the state law had been adopted and specially re-enacted by act of Congress. U. S. v. Mundell, 6 Call. 245.

The effects of the acts of 1789 was, as to proceedings in the courts of the United States, in actions at common law, that such proceedings were to be the same in each state as were used in the Supreme Court of the state in Sept. 1789, subject to such alterations as the courts of the United States may make, or the Supreme Court of the United States may prescribe. Wayman v. Southard, ante, 1; Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. 648.

The acts of 1789 did not operate prospectively to adopt future regulations upon procedure which might from time to time be established in the states. Brewster v. Gelston, 1 Paine 426; Bell v. Davidson, 3 Wash. C. C. 328; Craig v. Brown, 3 Wash. C. C. 503; Yaw v. Mead, 5 McLean, 272.

Under the act of May 8th, 1792, the effect of final process in the United States courts may be so varied by rule as that it shall reach property which by the state laws in force in 1789, was not liable to be taken in execution; or, so as to exempt property not then exempt, but which has been made so by subsequent state laws. Wayman v. Southard, ante, 1; Bk. of U. S. v. Halstead, ante, 51; Fullerton v. Bk. of U. S. 1 Pet. 604; be no doubt. But it had been settled by a long series of decisions in the local tribunal, and has become a settled rule of property, which this court would respect, in the same manner as it always respected the interpretation of local statutes by the state courts.[1]

On the part of the respondents, it was insisted that the prohibition in the statute to give a copy of the survey, excludes the idea of that notoriety which is ascribed to a record. Though inserted for preservation in a book, which is termed a book of record, it does not become substantially a matter of record, until it becomes public, and accessible to all the 156*] world. Even if an inspection of *the book was demandable as a matter of right, such an inspection would, from the nature of things, be of no avail, unless an office copy could be obtained. The notoriety of the surveys referred to in the entry, would not, therefore, be inferred from the fact that the three months, within which they were directed by the statute to be recorded, had expired before making the entry. It was also insisted that the appellant's claim did not entitle him to maintain the bill in his own name, for the land in question. He was a tenant in common with the others, and could not be allowed to sue in equity without making his co-tenants parties to the bill.[2] The length of time since which the plaintiff's title had accrued, was also insisted on as an equitable bar. More than twenty years had elapsed, and the principle was well settled that a court of equity would adopt the analogy of the statute of limitations, applied to bar an entry, or an ejectment, as the rule to be applied to equitable rights and remedies.[3] The statute of limitations is made to protect against ancient claims, whether well or ill founded, the *evidences of which may [*157 have been lost, or obscured by time.[4]

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit was brought by the appellant, Elmendorf, in the court for the seventh circuit and district of Kentucky, to obtain a conveyance of lands held by the defendants under a prior grant, and under entries which are also older than the entry of the plaintiff. As the defendants do not adduce their entries, and rely entirely on their patent, the case depends on the validity of the plaintiff's entry. That was made in April, 1784, and was afterwards, in July of the same year, explained, or amended, so as to read as follows: "Walker Daniel enters 8,000 acres, beginning at the most south-westwardly corner of Duncan Rose's survey of 8,000 acres between Floyd's Fork and Bull Skin; thence along his westwardly line to the corner; thence the same course with James Kemp's line, north 2° west, 964 poles to a survey of John Lewis for 22,000 acres; thence with Lewis's line, and from the beginning south 7° west, till a line parallel with the first line will include the quantity."

As this entry begins at "the most south-westwardly corner of Duncan Rose's survey of 8,000 acres, between Floyd's Fork and Bull Skin," the first inquiry is, whether this survey was at the time an object of sufficient notoriety to give validity *to an entry [*158 calling for one of its corners as a beginning. It is not pretended that the survey itself had acquired this notoriety; but the plaintiff contends that it had become a matter of record; and that subsequent purchasers were, on that account, bound to know its position, in like manner as they are bound to know the position of entries. The land law prescribes that surveys shall be returned to the office, and recorded in a record book, to be kept for that purpose by the principal surveyor, within three months from the time of their being made. They are to be returned to the land-office in twelve months from their date, during which time the surveyor is forbidden to give a copy to any person other than the owner.

It is contended by the defendants, that this prohibition to give a copy of the plat and certificate of survey, excludes the idea of that notoriety which is ascribed to a record. Though inserted for preservation in a book which is denominated a book of record, it does not become, in fact, a record, until it shall partake of that characteristic quality of the record, on which the obligation to notice it is founded, being accessible to all the world. Were even an inspection of the book demandable as matter of right, which the defendants deny, that inspection would, they say, from the nature of the thing, be of no avail, unless a copy was also attainable. They insist, therefore, that the notoriety of these surveys is not to be implied from the fact that the three months had expired, during which they were directed by law to be recorded.

159*] *The plaintiff contends that the book of surveys has every characteristic of a record, except that the surveyor is restrained from granting copies, until the time limited by law for the return of surveys to the land-office shall have expired; and denies that the notoriety attached to a record is dependent entirely on the right to demand a copy of it. He maintains the right to inspect it, and insists that this right has been considered by the legislature as giving sufficient notice to all persons interested in the property to enter a caveat against the issuing of a patent, from which he implies that it is intended as a record to give notice, although a copy of it cannot be obtained.

Were this question now for the first time to be decided, a considerable contrariety of opinion respecting it would prevail in the court; but it will be unnecessary to discuss it, if the point shall appear to be settled in Kentucky.

This court has uniformly professed its disposition, in cases depending on the laws of a particular state, to adopt the construction which the courts of the state have given to those laws. This course is founded on the principle, supposed to be universally recognized, that the judicial department of every government, where such department exists, is the appropriate organ for construing the legislative acts of that government. Thus, no court in the universe, which professed to be governed by principle, would, we presume, undertake to say that the courts of Great Britain, or of France, or of any other nation, had misunderstood their own statutes, and therefore erect *itself into a tribunal which should cor- [*160 rect such misunderstanding. We receive the construction given by the courts of the nation as the true sense of the law, and feel ourselves no more at liberty to depart from that construction than to depart from the words of the statute. On this principle, the construction given by this court to the constitution and laws of the United States is received by all as the true construction; and on the same principle, the construction given by the courts of the several states to the legislative acts of those states, is received as true, unless they come in conflict with the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. If, then, this question has been settled in Kentucky, we must suppose it to be rightly settled.

The defendants contend that conflicting opinions have ben given in the state, and that the question is still open; while the plaintiff insists that the real question, that is, the notoriety of a survey after being made three months, has never been determined in the negative.

The first case of which we have any knowledge, is Sinclair v. Singleton (Hughes, 92). The decision of the court was in favor of the validity of an entry which calls for the lines of a survey. The court is not in possession of the book in which the case is reported; but, judging from the references made to it in subsequent cases, the entry must have been made within twelve, and, probably, within three months of the date of the survey.

The next case in which the question was di- 161*] rectly *made, is Key v. Matson (Hardin, 70), decided in the fall term of 1806. The survey had not been made three months, at the date of the entry; and the court determined that it was not an object of notoriety. A rehearing was moved for, and, according to the course of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, errors were assigned in the original decree. The first was, that "the court has decided that an entry dependent on a survey not made three months, is void; whereas, according to law and former decisions, such an entry ought to have been valid."

The court adhered to its first decision, and used expressions, which, though applied to a case in which the entry was made before the expiration of three months after the survey on which it depended, yet indicated the opinion that an entry, made after the expiration of three months from the date of the survey, would be equally invalid.

Moore v. Whitlege (Hardin, 89) and Respass v. Arnold (Hardin, 115), decided in the spring of 1807, were on the authority of Key v. Matson, and were also cases in which the entries were made a few weeks after the surveys. The case of Cartwright v. Collier (Hardin, 179), decided in the spring of 1808, was one in which the entry was made only fifteen days after the survey. In Ward v. Lee (1 Bibb, 27), decided in 1808, the entry called for a survey which had been made twenty-three days, of the return of which, to the office, there was no proof. The judge adds: "If it had been returned and 162*] recorded, *yet no person was entitled to a copy." This last observation is indicative of the opinion that a survey, though recorded, would not become an object of notoriety until a copy of it was demandable; but it was made in a case in which that point did not occur. The case of Cleland's Heirs v. Gray, decided at the same time, is of the same character. The survey was made sixteen days before the entry which called to adjoin it. The judge says: "It is clear that no description in this certificate of Evan Shelby's survey can aid Weeden's entry, because it does not appear that the certificate was even made out, or deposited in the surveyor's office, at the date of Weeden's entry. But if it had been recorded, yet it was inaccessible to holders of warrants. They were not entitled to a copy until twelve months after the making of the survey; nor was the surveyor himself bound to record it in less than three months after the survey was made."

In the case of Galloway v. Neale et al. (1 Bibb, 140), the judge who delivered the opinion of the court states the law thus: "If the holder of a warrant adopts a survey previously made upon another warrant as the basis of a location, he must prove the notoriety of the survey at that period, otherwise his location cannot be supported. If he has adopted such survey at a period earlier than that at which the law has opened the record thereof for copies, he must prove its notoriety by evidence aliunde."

This plain declaration of the opinion of the court on this point was, however, made in a *case in which it did not arise. The [*163 survey had preceded the entry which called for it, more than twelve months.

The cases of Davis v. Bryan, 2 Bibb. 113, and Davis v. Davis, 2 Bibb. 137, decided in the spring of 1810, were, each of them, cases in which surveys preceded the entries calling for them, less than three months.

It is, then, true, that from 1806 to 1810, inclusive, the prevailing opinion of the court of Kentucky was, that an entry could derive no aid from the description contained in the plat and certificate of a survey for which it called, until that survey had been made twelve months; but it is also true, that this opinion has been advanced only in cases in which the point did not occur.

The first case in which the point actually occurred, was Carson v. Hanway (3 Bibb, 160). The entry was made on the 9th of February, 1784, and called for a survey made on the 15th of February, 1783. The entry was supported on the principle that the plat and certificate of survey constituted a part of it. In delivering the opinion of the court, the judge said: "When the survey has been so long made that the law requires it to be of record, it will be presumed to be so, and a call for its lines, in an entry, will render it a part of the description of such entry."

At the preceding term, before the same judges, the case of Bush v. Jamison (3 Bibb, 118) was argued, and the court determined that an entry could not be aided by the description contained in a survey which had been made only seven days *prior to the [*164 entry which called to adjoin it. In giving its opinion, the court says: "How far a subsequent adventurer would have been bound by a description given in the survey of its beginning corner, if the survey had been of record, is not material to inquire; for there is no proof that the survey was, in fact, of record; and, as the law did not require that it should have been recorded at the date of the entry, a presumption that it was cannot be indulged, according to any rule of probability or on any principle recognized in former adjudications of this court."

These cases, decided so near each other, by the same judges, show clearly, by the terms in which they are expressed, that the distinction between a survey, neither recorded in fact, nor in presumption of law, was in the mind of the court; and that its former adjudications were considered.

Reed's Heirs v. Dinwiddie (3 Marsh. Rep. 185) was decided in the year 1820. In that case, an entry called for a survey which had been made six months, and the court determinded that the person claiming under this entry might avail himself of the notoriety contained in the certificate of survey, "which, from its date, must have been of record."

Jackman's Heirs v. Walker's Heirs (3 Litt.

Rep. 100) is the last case which has been cited. It was decided in 1823. The surveys were made about ten months before the entry, which called to adjoin them, and the court allowed to the entry all the aid which could be 165*] derived from the *description contained in the next certificate of survey; because, "from the length of time they had been made before the date of the entry in question, the law required them to be of record, and, of course, they must be presumed to be so."

From the year 1813, then, to the present time, the courts of Kentucky have uniformly decided that a survey must be presumed to be recorded at the expiration of three months from its date; and that an entry dependent on it is entitled to all the notoriety which is possessed by the survey. We must consider the construction as settled finally in the courts of the state, and that this court ought to adopt the same rule, should we even doubt its correctness.

We think, then, that the entry under which the plaintiff claims, is aided by the notoriety of the surveys which it calls to adjoin, if those surveys have been made three months anterior to its date.

This depends on the question whether it is to date from April or July, 1784. The defendants insist that the amendment, or explanation, of the first of July, does not change the ground originally occupied, and is, therefore, not to be considered as having any influence on the date of the entry, or as connecting it with the surveys mentioned in the amendment or explanation.

We cannot think so. This amendment would be seen by subsequent locators, and would give them as full notice that the entry adjoined the surveys of Duncan Rose, James Kemp, and John Lewis, as they would have received had 166*] the *original entry been made on that day. Were, it then, to be conceded that the original entry, calling for Greenville Smith's line, instead of James Kemp's, would have been construed to cover the same ground which it now covers, still we perceive no substantial reason for refusing to the change made in its terms any advantage belonging to the date of that change.

We think, then, for the purpose of the present inquiry, the entry is to be considered as if made on the first of July, 1784, and is entitled to all the notoriety of the surveys for which it calls.

This being established, we do not understand that any controversy remains on the question of notoriety. Some of the objects called for in the surveys are so well known as to fix incontrovertibly the beginning of the entry made by Walker Daniel; and its validity is not questioned on any other ground.

The validity of the plaintiff's entry being established, it remains to consider the other objections which are made to a decree in his favor.

2. It is contended that he is a tenant in common with others, and ought not to be permitted to sue in equity, without making his co-tenants parties to the suit.

This objection does not affect the jurisdiction, but addresses itself to the policy of the court. Courts of equity require that all the parties concerned in interest shall be brought before them, that the matter in controversy may be finally settled. This equitable rule, however, is framed by *the court itself [*167 and is subject to its discretion. It is not, like the description of parties, an inflexible rule, a failure to observe which turns the party out of court, because it has no jurisdiction over his cause; but, being introduced by the court itself, for the purposes of justice, is susceptible of modification for the promotion of those purposes. In this case, the persons who are alleged to be tenants in common with the plaintiffs, appear to be entitled to a fourth part, not of the whole tract, but of a specially described portion of it, which may, or may not, interfere with the part occupied by the defendants. Neither the bill nor answers allege such an interference, and the court ought not, without such allegation, to presume it. Had the decree of the Circuit Court been in favor of the plaintiff, and had this objection to it been deemed sufficient to induce this court to reverse it, and send back the case for the examination of this fact, it could never have justified a dismission of the bill without allowing the plaintiff an opportunity of showing that he was the sole owner of the lands in dispute. In addition to these observations, it may be proper to say that the rule which requires that all persons concerned in interest, however, remotely, should be made parties to the suit, though applicable to most cases in the courts of the United States, is not applicable to all. In the exercise of its discretion, the court will require the plaintiff to do all in his power to bring every person concerned in interest before the court. But, if the case may be completely decided *as between the litigant parties, [*168 the circumstance that an interest exists in some other person, whom the process of the court cannot reach, as if such party be a resident of some other state, ought not to prevent a decree upon its merits. It would be a misapplication of the rule, to dismiss the plaintiff's bill because he has not done that which the law will not enable him to do.[1]

3. The third point in the defense is, the length of time which has elapsed since the plaintiff's equitable title accrued.

His patent was issued on the 11th of February, 1794, and those of the defendants are of prior date. His bill was filed on the 28th of December, 1815. Several of the defendants, in their answers, claim the benefit of the length of time.

From the earliest ages, courts of equity have refused their aid to those who have neglected, for an unreasonable length of time, to assert their claims, especially where the legal estate has been transferred to purchasers without notice. Although the statutes of limitations do not, either in England, or in these states, extend to suits in chancery; yet the courts in both countries have acknowledged their obligation. Their application, we believe, has never been controverted; and in the recent case of Thomas v. Harvie's Heirs,[2] decided at this term, it was expressly recognized. But the statute of limitations, which *bars an [*169

ejectment after the lapse of twenty years, constitutes no bar to a writ of right, even where the tenant counts on his own seisin, until thirty years shall have elapsed. Whether a court of equity considers an equitable claim to land as barred when the right of entry is lost, or will sustain a bill as long as the mere right may be asserted, is a question of some difficulty, and of great importance. The analogy of a bill in equity to actions founded on a right of entry, seems to derive some title to consideration, from the circumstance that the plaintiff does not sustain his claim on his own seisin, or that of his ancestor, but on an equity not necessarily accompanied by seisin, whereas seisin is an indispensable ingredient in a writ of right. But the case must depend upon precedent, and if the one rule or the other has been positively adopted, it ought to be respected.

In the case of Jenner v. Tracy (3 P. Wms. 287, in a note) the defendant demurred to a bill to redeem mortgaged premises, of which the defendant had been in possession more than twenty years, and the demurrer was sustained; the court observing, that "as twenty years would bar an entry or ejectment, there was the same reason for allowing it to bar a redemption. It is added, that "the same rule was agreed in the case of Belch v. Harvey, by the Lord Talbot. In 3 Atk. Rep. 225, the court expressed an opinion unfavorable to a demurrer in such a case, because the plaintiff ought to be at liberty, in his replication, to show that he is within the exceptions of 170*] *the statute; but supported the bar when pleaded. The same principle is recognized in 3 Atk. Rep. 313. The rule appears to have been laid down in 1 Ch. Cas., and to have been observed ever since.

In 3 Johns. Ch. Rep., Chancellor Kent said: "It is a well-settled rule, that twenty years' possession by the mortgagee, without account or acknowledgment of any subsisting mortgage, is a bar to a redemption, unless the mortgageor can bring himself within the proviso in the statute of limitations."

These decisions were made on bills to redeem mortgaged premises; but as no reason can be assigned why an equity of redemption should be barred in a shorter time than any other equity, they appear to us to apply with equal force to all bills asserting equitable titles. We have seen no dictum asserting that the rule is not applicable to other equitable rights, and we should not feel justified in drawing a distinction which has never heretofore been drawn. But we think the rule has been applied to equitable rights generally.

In the second volume of Eq. Cas. Abr. title "Length of Time," it is said generally, "that possession for more than twenty years, under a legal title, shall never be disturbed in equity." The case of Cook v. Arnham (3 P. Wms. 283), was a bill brought to supply the want of a surrender of copyhold estate to the use of the will; and it was objected, that the application to the court had been unreasonably delayed. The Lord Chancellor said that "the 171*] length of time was not above *fourteen years, which, as it would not bar an ejectment, so neither could it bar a bill in equity."

The case of Bond v. Hopkins et al. (1 Sch. & Lef., 413) was a suit brought by a person claiming to be the heir, to set aside a will alleged to be obtained by fraud, to obtain possession of title papers, and to remove impediments out of the way in a trial at law. Length of possession was set up as a bar to the relief prayed for in the bill; and the question, which was discussed at the bar by very eminent counsel, was profoundly and deliberately considered by Lord Redesdale. The testator died in November, 1754, and the bill was filed in June, 1792, so that thirty-eight years had elapsed between the death of the testator and the filing of the bill. As this time was not sufficient to bar a writ of right, no question could have arisen respecting the act of limitations, had the rule of granting relief in equity depended on the ability of the plaintiff to maintain a writ of right. But the rule was clearly understood, both at the bar and by the court, to be, that the equitable rule respecting the length of time had reference to twenty years, the time during which the right of entry was preserved, not to the time limited for maintaining a writ of right. In the very elaborate and very able opinion given by the chancellor, in this case, in which he investigates thoroughly the principles which govern a court of equity in its decisions on the statute of limitations, it is not insinuated that it acts in any case from *analogy to a writ of [*172 right, but is assumed as an acknowledged and settled principle that it acts from analogy to a writ of ejectment. In this case, a suit had been instituted by John Bond, the grandfather of the plaintiff, as early as 1755, and a decree pronounced in 1770. The full benefit of this decree was not obtained, and John Bond took forcible possession of a part of the property, of which he was dispossessed by order of the court, on a bill for that purpose, brought by the defendant. The said John Bond died in prison, in 1774, having first devised the property in dispute to his son Thomas, then an infant, for life, with remainder to his first, and other sons, in strict settlement. Soon after his death, an ejectment was brought by the defendant, to recover part of the property in possession of Bond; and in 1776, a bill was filed by Thomas Bond, then a minor, to enjoin the defendants from proceeding in their ejectment, and to have the will delivered up. Various orders were taken; and in June, 1792, an original bill, in the nature of a bill of revivor, was filed by Thomas Bond and his eldest son, Henry. In discussing this case, so far as respected length of time, no doubt was entertained that the plaintiffs would have been barred of all relief in equity, by a quiet acquiescence in the possession of the defendants for twenty years. It was a strong case of fraud, but an acquiescence of twenty years would have closed the Court of Equity against the plaintiffs. This was not questioned; but it was insisted that the pendency of suits, from the year 1755, when John *Bond, the son and heir of the [*173 testator, returned from America, had preserved the equity of the plaintiffs, unaffected by the lapse of time; and of this opinion was the court.

The case of Howenden v. Lord Annesly (2 Sch. & Lef. 607) was a bill filed in May, 1794, to set aside a conveyance made in July, 1726, alleged to have been fraudulently obtained. There were some circumstances on which the plaintiff relied, as relieving his case from the laches justly imputable to him for permitting such a length of time to elapse; but they need not be noticed, because they were deemed insufficient by the chancellor, and the bill was dismissed. In discussing this point, Lord Redesdale reviewed the cases which had been determined, and said, "that it had been a fundamental law of state policy, in all countries, and at all times, that there should be some limitation of time, beyond which the question of title should not be agitated. In this country, the limitation has been fixed (except in writs of right, and writs depending on questions of mere title) at twenty years." "But it is said that courts of equity are not within the statute of limitations. This is true in one respect; they are not within the words of the statutes, because the words apply to particular legal remedies; but they are within the spirit and meaning of the statutes, and have been always so considered." After reasoning for some time on this point, and citing several cases to show "that wherever the legislature has limited a period for law proceedings, equity 174*] will, in analogous *cases, consider the equitable rights as bound by the same limitation." he says, "a court of equity is not to impeach a transaction on the ground of fraud, where the fact of the alleged fraud was within the knowledge of the party sixty years before. On the contrary, I think the rule has been so laid down, that every right of action in equity, that accrues to the party, whatever it may be, must be acted upon, at the utmost, within twenty years."

This question was fully discussed, and solemnly, and we think, finally decided, in the case of The Marquis Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton et al. reported in 2d volume of Jacobs & Walker. In that case, the title accrued in December, 1791, and the bill was filed in June, 1812. Other points were made; but the great question on which the cause depended was the length of time which had been permitted to elapse; and this question, after being argued with great labor and talent at the bar, was decided by the court, upon a full review of all the cases which are to be found in the books. It was considered, and was treated by the court, as one of the highest importance; and the opinion was unequivocally expressed, that "both on principle and authority, the laches and non-claim of the rightful owner of an equitable estate, for a period of twenty years (supposing it the case of one who must, within that period, have made his claim in a court of law, had it been a legal estate), under no disability, and where there has been no fraud, will constitute a bar to equitable relief, by 175*] analogy to the statute of limitations, *if, during all that period, the possession has been held under a claim unequivocally adverse and without anything having been done or said, directly or indirectly, to recognize the title of such rightful owner by the adverse possessor." Upon this ground alone the bill was dismissed. The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords, and the decree was affirmed.

The Lord Chancellor, in delivering his opinion in the House of Lords, took a distinction, as to length of time, between trusts, "some being express, and some implied." "In the case of a strict trustee, it was his duty to take care of the interest of his cestui que trust, and he was not permitted to do anything adverse to it; a tenant also had the duty to preserve the interests of his landlord; and many acts, therefore, of a trustee, and a tenant, which, if done by a stranger, would be acts of adverse possession, would not be so in them, from its being their duty to abstain from them."

In a case of actual adverse possession, however, as was that before the House, his lordship considered twenty years as constituting a bar. Lord Redesdale was of the same opinion, and, in the course of his address, remarked that "it had been argued that the Marquis Cholmondeley might, at law, have had a writ of right. That was a writ to which particular privileges were allowed, but courts of equity had never regarded that writ, or writs of formedon, or others of the same nature. They had always considered the provision in the statute of James, which applied *to rights, and [*176 titles of entry, and in which the period of limitation was twenty years, as that by which they were bound, and it was that upon which they had constantly acted."

This is not an express trust. The defendants are not, to use the language of the Lord Chancellor in the case last cited, "strict trustees, whose duty it is to take care of the interest of cestuis que trust, and who are not permitted to do anything adverse to it." They hold under a title in all respects adversary to that of the plaintiff, and their possession is an adversary possession. In all cases where such a possession has continued for twenty years, it constitutes, in the opinion of this court, a complete bar in equity. An ejectment would be barred, did the plaintiff possess a legal title.

This point has been decided in the same manner by the courts of Kentucky. The counsel for the plaintiff insist that those decisions are founded on the peculiar opinions entertained by that court respecting writs of right. We do not think so. Their doctrine on that subject is, indeed, used as an auxiliary argument; but it is merely auxiliary to an opinion formed without its aid.

The decree of the Circuit Court is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with instructions that the entry under which the plaintiff claims is valid; but that the adversary possession of the defendants, respectively, constitutes a complete bar to the plaintiff's bill, *wherever it would constitute [*177 a bar to an ejectment, did the plaintiff possess a legal title.[1]

1.—Although, in general, length of time is no bar to an express trust, clearly established to have once existed, yet, as length of time necessarily obscures all human evidence, and deprives parties of the means of ascertaining the nature of the original transactions, it operates, by way of presumption, in favor of innocence, and against the imputation of fraud. It was therefore held by this court that the lapse of forty years, and the death of all the original parties, would discharge and extinguish a trust, proved once to have existed by strong circumstances; by analogy to the rule of law, which, after the lapse of time, presumes the payment of a debt, surrender of a deed, and extinguishment of a trust, where cir-

It is therefore further ordered and decreed that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court, with instructions to take such further proceedings therein, conformably to this opinion, as may be agreeable to equity and good conscience. BANKS, Appellant,

v.

CARNEAL et al., Respondents.

The joinder of improper parties, as citizens of the same state, etc. will not affect the jurisdiction of the circuit courts in equity, as between the parties who are properly before the court, if a decree may be pronounced as between the parties who are citizens of the same state.

A decree must be sustained by the allegations of the parties, as well as by the proofs in the cause, and cannot be founded upon a fact not put in issue by the pleadings.

The treaty of 1778, between the United [*182 States and France, allowed the citizens of either country to hold lands in the other; and the title, once vested in a French subject, to hold lands in the United States, was not devested by the abrogation of that treaty, and the expiration of the subsequent convention of 1800.

cumstances require it. Prevost v. Gratz, (ante Vol. VI. p. 481, 497.) In the case of Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 265, the whole subject of presumptions from the lapse of time is gone fully into by Lord Erskine, both as applicable to incorporeal hereditaments, and where there is a written title. He states the doctrine to be founded in reason, the nature and character of man, and the result of human experience. "It resolves itself into this: that a man will naturally enjoy what belongs to him." "It has been said you cannot presume, unless you believe. But it is because there are no means of creating belief or disbelief, that such general presumptions are raised upon subjects of which there is no record or written muniment. Therefore, upon the weakness and infirmity of all human tribunals, judging of matters of antiquity, instead of belief, which must be the foundation of the judgment upon a recent transaction, where the circumstances are incapable of forming anything like belief, the legal presumption holds the place of particular and individual belief."

Although some of the principles laid down in this decision seem to be questioned by Mr. Sugden, in his treaties on the Law of Vendors and Purchasers (p. 250), yet it was cited with entire approbation, and its doctrine adopted by this court, in determining the above case of Prevost v. Gratz, ante, Vol. VI. p. 504.

In the case of Smith v. Clay (reported in 3 Bro. Ch. Rep. 639. note), and which is also cited and adopted by this court in the case of Thomas v. Harvie's Heirs, ante, p. 146, Lord Camden says: "A court of equity, which is never active in relief against conscience, or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his right, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity, but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence; where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and, therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction, there was always a limitation to suits in this court." After applying this principle to limit a bill of review and appeals, by analogy to the statute concerning writs of error, he proceeds to cite the maxim, Expedit rei publicæ ut sit finis litium, and to state that it had prevailed in the Court of Equity, in all times, without the help of an act of parliament. "But as the court has no legislative authority, it could not properly define the time of bar, by a positive rule, to an hour, a minute, or a year; it was governed by circumstances. But as often as parliament had limited the time of action and remedies to a certain period in legal proceedings, the Court of Chancery adopted that rule, and applied it to similar cases in equity. For where the legislature had fixed the time at law, it would have been preposterous for equity, which, by its own proper authority, always maintained a limitation, to countenance laches beyond the period that law has been confined to by parliament. Therefore, in all cases where the legal right has been barred by parliament, the equitable right to the same thing has been concluded by the same bar. Thus, the account of rents and profits, in a common case, shall not be carried beyond six years. Nor shall redemption be allowed after twenty years' possession in a mortgagee."

So, also, this court, in the case of Hughes v. Edwards (ante. Vol. IX., pp. 489, 497), adopted the same principle in relation to the effect of the lapse of time upon the respective rights of mortgageor and mortgagee, and of purchasers claiming under the former.

The great case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, cited in the text, was that of an estate subject to a mortgage in fee, being in settlement with an ultimate limitation to the right heirs of S. R.; A., on the expiration of the previous estate, entered, claiming to be entitled, under the limitation; and he, and after his death, his son, continued in quiet possession, paying interest on the mortgage, for twenty years. It was finally determined, after much litigation, that the devisee of the person really entitled under the limitation, was barred by the length of time.

The case, as first decided in the Court of Chancery, will be found reported in 2 Meriv. Rep. 173, 357, where it was determined, by Sir W. Grant, M. R., that the lapse of time was no bar by analogy to the statute of limitations. Upon its afterwards coming on before his successor, Sir T. Plumer, the latter delivered a learned and elaborate judgment, which will be found reported in 2 Jacobs & Walker, 138, tending to show that wherever in the claim of a legal estate, the remedy is barred in a court of law by the statute of limitations, the remedy for an equitable estate will be equally barred, by the lapse of the same period of time, in a court of equity. An appeal was taken to the House of Lords, and in moving the judgment of the House, Lord Eldon adverted to the general principles adopted by courts of equity on the subject of length of time, and observed on "the vast difference between trusts, some being express, some implied; some, relations formed between individuals in the matter in which they deal with each other, and in which it could hardly be said, that one was trustee, and the other cestui que trust, and yet it could not well be denied that for some purposes they were so. Of this kind, he took the relation between a mortgageor and mortgagee to be. In the case of a strict trustee, it was his duty to take care of the interest of his cestui que trust, and he was not permitted to do anything adverse to it; a tenant, also, had a duty to preserve the interests of THESE causes was argued by Mr. Jones for Banks, and by Mr. Bibb for Carneal and others.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals are from a decree of the Circuit Court for the district of Kentucky, in which Carneal's heirs were decreed to pay Henry Banks $2,500, for failing to perform a contract entered into between Thomas Carneal, their ancestor, and the said Henry Banks.

The bill filed by Henry Banks, charges that his agent, Cuthbert Banks, entered into a contract with Thomas Carneal, whereby he agreed to transfer to Carneal the right of the said Banks in 30,000 acres of land purchased by him from John Harvie, for which right said Carneal "agrees to give a tract of 2,000 acres of land on Green River, patented for Philip Philips, which was sold out of a tract of 22,100 acres, by Philips, to Michael Lacassaign, deceased, by said Lacassaign to said Carneal, on the 30th of July, 1797, for which land said Carneal is to make a general warranty deed whenever thereunto required."

The bill further charges that Carneal was guilty of fraud in pretending to have a good 183*] title *to the said 2,000 acres of land, the whole being covered with better title, and in representing the land as much more valuable than it really is. The bill prays that the contract may be rescinded, and that the plaintiff may be re-instated in his rights to the said 30,000 acres of land, or have the value thereof in damages. And that the heirs of John Harvie, deceased, in whom the legal title to the said 30,000 acres remains, may be decreed to convey the same to him.

The heirs of T. Carneal deny all fraud in his representation of the value of the land sold to the plaintiff, and insist on their ability to convey the same. They admit that the deed from Lacassaign to him was not recorded within the time limited by law, one of the three subscribing witnesses then required for its proof, having died before it was offered to the court. In consequence of this circumstance, Carneal, in 1779, instituted a suit in chancery against Lacassaign, to perfect his title, which abated by his death. The law being so changed as to admit deeds to record on the oath of two subscribing witnesses, this deed was recorded in 1814, and the defendants are willing to convey, if directed so to do.

The defendants farther state that the plaintiff's original claim on the said 30,000 acres of land, was to only a moiety thereof, the other moiety being the property of the locator, which has been transferred to the defendants. The said Banks assigned the survey to J. Harvie, that the patent might issue in his name, in trust for the person entitled to the locator's moiety, and the title still *remains in [*184 Harvie's heirs, encumbered by debts due from Banks to Harvie, and by an obligation in which Harvie was bound to Thomas Madison, as surety for Banks, for the conveyance of military lands north-west of the Ohio. To obtain a title from Harvie, the said Carneal, in September, 1799, bound himself to pay the debt due from Banks, with Harvie as his security, to Madison, on condition that Banks would deliver him military land-warrants to the amount of 4,300 acres; and it was expressly stipulated that Carneal should retain the title to the said 2,000 acres of land until Banks should perform this contract. He requires the plaintiff to show how he has performed it. They understand that Harvie's heirs have a claim on the estate of their ancestor, of which they know nothing certain, and aver that the title to the locator's moiety of the said 30,000 acres of land remains in the said heirs. The defendants, then, pursuing a practice authorized by law in the state courts of Kentucky, pray that their answer may be received as a cross bill; and that Harvie's heirs, as well as Banks, may be made defendants to it, and may answer it; and that the whole controversy may be settled.

On the 20th of September, 1799, J. Harvie conveyed to T. Carneal the moiety of the said patent for 30,000 acres, which had been sold by the said banks to Carneal.

On the same day, the following agreement was entered into:

"Thomas Carneal agrees to pay John Preston or John Harvie, 3,200 acres of military land, *lying on the north-west side of the [*185 river Ohio, surveyed on or before the 10th day of October, 1795, to satisfy a bond executed by his landlord; and many acts, therefore, of a trustee and tenant, which, if done by a stranger, would be acts of adverse possession, would not be so in them, from its being their duty to abstain from them. But the case of a mortgagee was different, he being at liberty to hold possession, and not becoming strictly a trustee until the money was tendered to him, and having a right, if he continued in possession for twenty years, without acknowledging the mortgage, to turn round on the mortgageor, and say that the estate was his own. His lordship could not agree to, and had never heard of, such a rule, as that adverse possession, however long, would not avail against an equitable estate; he meant, where there was no duty which the person who has it, has undertaken to discharge for him against whom he pleads adverse possession. The possession of Lord Clinton was adverse; it had been said that it was taken by consent, founded on mistake; but that did not make the possession the less adverse, because Lord Clinton took, and kept it for himself, where he owed, as it appeared to him, no duty to Lord Orford. He concluded by stating his opinion to be, that adverse possession of an equity of redemption for twenty years, was a bar to another person claiming the same equity of redemption, and worked the same effect, as disseisin, abatement, or intrusion, with respect to legal estate; and that, for the quiet and peace of titles, and the world, it ought to have the same effect. Lord Redesdale concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

Although, in general, lapse of time is not a bar to a direct trust, as between trustee and cestui que trust, so long as there is a continuing and subsisting trust acknowledged and acted upon between the parties, yet this must be understood as applying to such trusts only as are the creatures of a court of equity, or strict technical trusts, and not to those which are within the cognizance of a court of law; for, in regard to all those trusts which are the ground of an action at law, and where there is a concurrent jurisdiction at law, and in equity, the rule is the same, and the statute is a bar, both in a court of law and equity. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. Rep. 90, 127. And, though in cases of trusts peculiarly and exclusively of equity jurisdiction, the statute does not apply, yet, if the trustee denies the right of the cestui que trust, and the possession of the property becomes adverse, lapse of time may constitute a bar in equity. Ib. And where a person takes possession of property in his own right, and is, afterwards, by evidence or construction, changed into a trustee, he may insist on the lapse of time as a bar. Decouche v. Savatier, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 190.

the said John Harvie, as security for Henry Banks, to Thomas Madison, deceased, dated the 6th day of December, 1795; provided the said Carneal shall receive from Cuthbert Banks, in Kentucky, 4,300 acres of military continental land-warrants, within ninety days after the said Carneal shall make demand of them of Cuthbert Banks, in Lexington, in Kentucky; and provided the said Carneal shall not receive the warrants, he will not, afterwards, be bound to take them unless he pleases. Henry Banks agrees that he will furnish the said 4,300 acres of military land-warrants, through the agency of Cuthbert Banks, within the time above mentioned; and if he fails to do so, and the said Thomas Carneal satisfy the bond for military land due the estate of the said Thomas Madison, as aforesaid, by the said H. Banks and J. Harvie, in such case the said H. Banks obliges himself to satisfy and pay off the said obligation, according to its true value, upon the application of the said Thomas Carneal, or still to give the 4,300 acres of military land-warrants, at the option of the said Carneal." Signed by H. Banks and T. Carneal.

There are letters from J. Harvie to T. Carneal, the last dated the 3d of March, 1802, not long before his death, urging T. Carneal to satisfy the debt to the estate of T. Madison.

The answer of Banks to what is termed the cross bill, states that he has sued Madison's representatives in Virginia, to compel them to 186*] receive *a compensation in money for the military lands he was bound to pay, there being no lands which are within the description of the obligation; and that the suit is still depending.

The parties agree that the debt to Madison is not satisfied, and that the representatives of J. Harvie hold an obligation of T. Carneal, deceased, for payment of the same, or as indemnification to H., as referred to in the answer and pleadings in the same.

In May, 1819, the plaintiff filed an amended bill, stating that Michael Lacassaign was an alien, and never became a citizen of the United States. That his deed, being proved by only two witnesses, could not pass the title to T. Carneal. That Carneal knew his title to be defective when he sold to Banks. That Lacassaign left no heirs in this country, and has made some person in France his residuary legatee. That there are debts and judgments against him to a large amount, which bind the land.

The answer admits Lacassaign to have been a Frenchman, but not an alien. That he emigrated early to this country, before and at the close of the war, and continued a citizen till his death. They insist that the legal title passed, by the deed of the said Lacassaign, and deny that the land is encumbered.

The Circuit Court was of opinion that the contract between Banks and Carneal required that the tract of 2,000 acres, which Carneal bound himself to convey to Banks, should be a tract lying on Green River, and that as the 187*] land did *not touch the river in any part, it did not correspond with, and could not satisfy the contract. The court therefore directed an issue to ascertain the average value of 2.000 acres, part of the land granted to Philips, to bind on the river; and on receiving the verdict of the jury, directed its amount, with interest thereon, to be paid to the plaintiff.

From this decree both parties have appealed; and the counsel for Carneal's heirs assign for error,

1. That the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction.

2. That there is no allegation that the land does not, in point of location, fit the description of it in the contract.

3. That the plaintiff has no right to relief in equity, until he releases Carneal's representatives from their undertaking to Harvie; and Carneal's heirs have a right in equity to retain the land as an indemnity for that undertaking.

4. If Banks can recover on the agreement, his remedy is at law.

5. The decree against the heirs personally is erroneous. They are not named in the contract, and the statute of Kentucky does not authorize a suit against them personally in such a case.

1. The objection to the jurisdiction of the court is founded on this: That Banks states himself, in his bill, to be a citizen of Virginia, and does not state the heirs of Harvie to be citizens of Kentucky. They are, in truth, citizens of Virginia.

*If the validity of this objection, so [*188 far as respects Harvie's heirs, be unquestionable, it cannot affect the suit against Carneal's heirs, unless it be indispensable to bring Harvie's heirs before the court, in order to enable it to decree against Carneal's heirs. This is not the case. Harvey had conveyed to Carneal, Banks's moiety of the 30,000 acre tract of land, so that his heirs have no lien upon it; and they never had a claim on the 2,000 acre tract. They are made defendants by Banks, under the idea that the title to the land sold by him to Carneal was in them; but this is a mistake. The title to that land was in Carneal's heirs; and Banks can have no claim on the locator's moiety, the title to which seems to have been retained by Harvie. The bill, therefore, as to Harvie's heirs, may be dismissed, without in any manner affecting the suit against Carneal's heirs. That they have been improperly made defendants in his bill, cannot affect the jurisdiction of the court as between those parties who are properly before it. It is the matter contained in what is termed the cross bill, which may bring Harvie's heirs into the cause; and in that suit they would be proper parties, were they to appear, because the plaintiffs in it are all citizens of Kentucky, and the defendants appear to be all citizens of Virginia.[1]

2. The second error assigned has more weight. The variance between the location of the land *sold by Carneal to Banks, [*189 and the description of it in the contract, is not averred in the bill, and is, consequently, not put in issue. The maxim, that a decree must be sustained by the allegations of the parties, as well as by the proofs in the cause, is too well established to be disregarded. It is on this fact only, that the Circuit Court has rescinded the contract, and we do not think there is any other cause which would justify its being set aside. The alleged alienage of Lacassaign constitutes no objection. Had the fact been proved, this court decided, in the case of Chirac v. Chirac (reported in 2 Wheat. Rep., 259), that the treaty of 1778, between the United States and France, secures to the citizens and subjects of either power the privilege of holding lands in the territory of the other; and the omission to record the deed in time may involve the title in difficulty, but does not annul it. That circumstance might oppose considerable obstacles to a decree for a specific performance, if sought by Carneal's heirs, but does not justify a decree to set aside the contract. There is no subsequent purchaser, nor is it certain that the title which Carneal's heirs can make, will or can ever be disturbed by the creditors of Lacassaign. In such a state of things, there is, perhaps, no sufficient cause for the interference of a court of equity. Did this court, then, concur with the Circuit Court in its construction of the contract between Banks and Carneal, the decree could not be affirmed, because the parties have not put that fact in issue. But the majority is rather dis- [*190 posed *to the opinion that the words "lying on Green River," as used in this contract, with reference to a specific conveyance expressly mentioned, which contains within itself information which could not fail to suggest the idea that the land did not, in fact, bind on the river, may be satisfied with the land actually conveyed by Lacassaign to Carneal. The omission of Banks to charge Carneal with a misrepresentation in this respect, countenances this explanation. At all events, the fact, if relied upon by him, ought to have been put in issue, so as to give Carneal's heirs an opportunity of controverting it, and of bringing before the court such facts as might shed light upon it.

1.—Vide ante, Wormley v. Wormley, and note 1, Vol. VIII., p. 451; Kerr v. Watts, Vol. VI., p. 558; Cameron v. M'Roberts, Vol. III., p. 591; Russel v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 92.

Were this construction to be established, and were there no equitable objections to allowing Banks the full benefit of his contract, a specific performance might be decreed; but the bill seeks to rescind the contract, and contains no prayer for general relief.

There are, too, on the part of Carneal's heirs, weighty objections to such a decree at this time.

3. The third error assigned is, that Banks has no right to relief in equity until he releases Carneal's representatives from their undertaking to Harvie; and Carneal's heirs have a right in equity to retain the title to the 2,000 acres of land, as an indemnity for that undertaking.

The testimony on this part of the cause is far from being satisfactory.

The contract of the 20th of September, 1799, is expressed in such vague terms as to leave it [*191 in *some measure doubtful whether Carneal would not have been discharged from the obligation it imposed, on the failure of Cuthbert Banks to deliver the military land-warrants for which it stipulates within ninety days after they should be demanded in Lexington. But it does not appear that they have ever been demanded; and the fact that Harvie's conveyance of the land sold by Banks to Carneal was executed on the same day with this contract, goes far in showing that the parties understood the obligation of Carneal to be absolute. The subsequent letters of Harvie to Carneal show his opinion that the obligation of the contract continued; and the admission of Banks, in the cause, goes to the same point. The court must therefore consider Carneal's heirs as still liable for the debt due from Banks, with Harvie as his security, to Madison's estate.

It is alleged that Banks agreed that the title to the 2,000 acres of land should remain in Carneal as an indemnity for this undertaking; but this allegation is totally unsupported by evidence.

Carneal's heirs also charge that they, or some of them, have purchased the interest of the locator in the 30,000 acre tract, and that Harvie's heirs retain the title till Madison's claim shall be adjusted; but of this there is no proof.

Since, however, the legal title to the land sold by Carneal to Banks remains in the heirs of the vendor, the court is not satisfied that equity will force it from them, or compel them to make compensation in money for any breach of the contract, *until Banks shall in- [*192 demnify them for the undertaking of their ancestor on his account.

It is unnecessary to proceed farther in the examination of this case, because the court is of opinion that for the errors already stated, the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be reversed, and the bill be dismissed without prejudice.

Decree reversed.

M'CORMICK et ux., et al., Appellants,
v.
SULLIVANT et al., Respondents.

The courts of the United States are courts of limited, but not of inferior jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgment and decrees may be reversed for that cause, on a writ of error and appeal; but, until reversed, they are conclusive evidence between parties and privies.

The title and disposition of real property is governed by the lex loci rei sitæ.

The title to lands can only pass by devise, according to the laws of the state or country where the lands lie. The probate in one state, or country, is of no validity as affecting the title to lands in another.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Ohio.

The appellants filed their bill in equity in the court below, setting forth that William Craw-

193*] ford, *deceased, the father of the female appellants, being in his life-time a colonel in the Virginia line, on continental establishment, and, as such, entitled to the quantity of 6,666⅔ acres of land, to be laid off between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers, on the north-west side of the river Ohio, departed this life, having first duly made and published his last will and testament, bearing date the 16th of June, 1782, whereby he devised all his estate, not otherwise disposed of by said will, to be equally divided between his three children, John Crawford, and female complainants, and their heirs forever. That this will was proved and recorded in Westmoreland county, in the state of Pennsylvania, on the 10th of September in the same year. That a warrant for the above quantity of land was afterwards issued in the name of the said John Crawford, as heir-at-law of his father, under which the following entries were made: One for 800 acres, which was surveyed and patented to Lucas Sullivant, of which quantity 400 acres are claimed by Bernard Thompson; another for 955⅔ acres, which was surveyed and patented to John Armat, but then claimed by William Winship; another for 956 acres, patented to some person unknown, but claimed by Samuel Finley; another for 955 acres, patented to some person unknown, but believed to be claimed and possessed by Lucas Sullivant.

The bill then proceeds to interrogate the above parties, who are made defendants, severally, as to their knowledge of the above will, 194*] and of the *title of the female complainants, and requires of them to set forth and describe the lands severally claimed by them, from whom they purchased, at what time, and for what price the same was purchased, and when the purchase money was paid. The prayer is for a conveyance, by each defendant, of two-thirds of the land claimed by them respectively, and for possession.

The answer of the heirs of Winship states that the land to which they claim title was purchased, for a valuable consideration, of Thomas Armat, by their father, to whom a conveyance was made in the year 1807. That a bill was filed by the present complainants, against the said Thomas Armat, in the District Court of Ohio, exercising the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court, for the land now in controversy, to which the said Armat filed his answer, asserting himself to be a bona fide purchaser of the land, for a valuable consideration, and without notice, and that, the cause coming on to be heard, the bill was dismissed without costs, after which decree the purchase was made of Armat by the defendant's father. They insist upon, and pray to be protected by the said decree.

Finley answers, and alleges himself to be a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, of 500 acres, part of the 956 acres mentioned in the bill, from one Beauchamp, who claimed as assignee of Dyal, who was assignee of John Crawford, for which he paid, and received a patent, before notice of the claim of the plaintiffs, or of the will of William Crawford.

195*] *The heirs of Thompson filed a plea in bar, alleging that the complainants, in the year 1804, filed their bill in the District Court of Ohio, exercising the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court, against B. Thompson, their ancestor, under whom they claim, setting forth the same title, and, substantially, the same matters, as in their present bill, to which the said Thompson answered, and the complainants replied, and upon a hearing of the cause the bill was dismissed with costs, which decree is in full force, etc.

Sullivant filed a similar plea, and the bill was dismissed, as to him, by agreement.

A general replication was put in to the answers of Finley and Winship's heirs, and a special replication to the plea in bar, setting forth the record in the former suit, and alleging that the proceedings in that suit were coram non judice, the record not showing that the complainants and defendant in that suit were citizens of different states.

Upon the hearing, the bill was dismissed, and an appeal taken to this court.

Mr. Doddridge, for the appellants, argued that the former proceedings in the District Court of Ohio, pleaded in bar of the present suit, were absolutely null and void, the record not showing that the parties to that suit were citizens of different states, and, consequently, the suit was coram non judice. The courts of the United States are all courts of limited jurisdiction, and the presumption is, that a case is without their *jurisdiction until the [*196 contrary appears.[1] The jurisdiction must appear on the record, either as arising out of the character of the parties, or the nature of the controversy. If it arises from the character of the parties, as being citizens of different states, aliens, etc., the citizenship or alienage of the respective parties must be set forth.[2] He also contended that the probate of the will of W. Crawford, in Westmoreland county, now a part of the state of Pennsylvania, but then claimed by Virginia, as being within its territorial limits, was sufficient to pass the title to the lands in question; but if this were not so, that the probate and record of the will was notice to all the world, and affected, in the view of a court of equity, the consciences of the grantees, and all those claiming under them. He, however, concluded by asking, that in case the decree of the court below should be affirmed, that it might be without prejudice.

Mr. Scott, contra, insisted that the appellants had entirely failed in establishing any title to the lands in question, under the will of W. Crawford, they not having exhibited a probate either in the state of Virginia, or of Ohio, which then constituted a part of Virginia. By the law of Virginia, then in force, it was necessary that a will of lands should be duly proved, and admitted to *record in the court of [197 the county where the testator had his residence at the time of his decease; or, if he had no place of residence in the state, then in the County Court of the county where the lands devised were situate; or, if the land was of a certain value, it might be proved in the General Court.[3] The will of W. Crawford, whether executed in Virginia or elsewhere, could not have the effect to pass his real estate, situate in that state, unless made and proved in conformity with its laws. It belongs to the sovereign power of every state to prescribe the rules by which real property within its territory shall be transferred. No courts but those of Virginia or Ohio could have jurisdiction of this will, because the probate must depend upon the legality of the execution, and that again must depend upon the lex loci. The probate of a court of competent jurisdiction is, by the local law, conclusive evidence of the due execution of a will of real as well as personal estate. But the court of Westmoreland county could have no jurisdiction of the probate of this will, because that court was not established under the authority of Virginia, and because the lands did not lie in that county, nor was the testator resident there. A mere contested claim to the territorial jurisdiction could never lay the foundation to establish the validity of this probate, which was, in fact, made in a foreign country. It is laid down, by the text-writers on this subject, that "if a will be made in a foreign country, disposing 198] of goods in England, *it must be proved there."[1] A fortiori, would it be required to be proved there (if by the English law probate of a will of lands were conclusive), where it related to real property.[2] If this will could not pass the legal title to the lands in controversy, neither could the respondents be affected with constructive notice by the probate in Pennsylvania. Had it been duly proved and recorded in the state where the lands are situate, it is so vaguely drawn as not to designate, with certainty, the particular lands in question. The claim of the appellants would, therefore, still be but a latent equity, and the purchaser from the heir would be protected.[3] He also insisted that the respondents were protected by the former decree in the District Court. Although the courts of the United States are courts of limited jurisdiction, so that their judgments will be reversed on error, unless the jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record, yet they are not inferior courts in a technical sense; and so long as their judgments remain unreversed, they are conclusive. Their judgments may be reversed in an appellate court for this cause; but they are not mere nullities.[4]

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

199*] *The question which the plea of Thompson's heirs, and the answer of Winship's heirs, presents, is, whether the general decree of dismission of the bill in equity, filed by the present plaintiffs in the Federal District Court of Ohio, against the ancestor of these defendants, under whom they respectively claim title, is a bar of the remedy which is sought to be enforced by the present suit. The reason assigned by the replication, why that decree cannot operate as a bar, is, that the proceedings in that suit do not show that the parties to it, plaintiffs and defendants, were citizens of different states, and that, consequently, the suit was coram non judice, and the decree void.

But this reason proceeds upon an incorrect view of the character and jurisdiction of the inferior courts of the United States. They are all of limited jurisdiction; but they are not, on that account, inferior courts, in the technical sense of those words, whose judgments, taken alone, are to be disregarded. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgments and decrees are erroneous, and may, upon a writ of error, or appeal, be reversed for that cause. But they are not absolute nullities. This opinion was strongly intimated, if not decided, by this court, in the case of Kempe's Lessee v. Kennedy (5 Cranch's Rep., 185), and was afterwards confirmed by the decision made in the case of Skillern's Executors v. May's Executors (6 Cranch's Rep., 267). That suit came before this court upon a writ of error, where the decree *of the court [*200 below was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein. After this, it was discovered by that court that the jurisdiction was not stated in the proceedings, and the question was made, whether that court could dismiss the suit for that reason. This point, on which the judges were divided, was certified to the Supreme Court, where it was decided that the merits of the cause having been finally decided in this court, and its mandate only requiring the execution of its decree, the court below was bound to carry that decree into execution, notwithstanding the jurisdiction of that court was not alleged in the pleadings. Now, it is very clear that, if the decree had been considered as a nullity, on the ground that jurisdiction was not stated in the proceedings, this court could not have required it to be executed by the inferior courts.

We are therefore of opinion that the decree of dismission relied upon in this case, whilst it remains unreversed, it is a valid bar of the present suit as to the above defendants.

The next question is presented by the answer of Finley. At the death of William Crawford, in the year 1782, he was entitled to a certain quantity of land to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, under a promise contained in an act of the legislature of Virginia. His interest in this land was purely an equitable one. After his death, a warrant to survey the same was granted to John Crawford, his only son and heir-at-law, who assigned to one Dyal a certain *tract which had been surveyed under [*201 the warrant, and the defendant claims a part of the tract so surveyed, under Beauchamp, who purchased from Dyal. He alleges, in his answer, that he made the purchase bona fide, paid the purchase money, and obtained a grant for the land, before he had notice of the will of William Crawford, or of the claim of his daughters under it.

Crawford's will, under which the female complainants claim title, was proved in some court in the county of Westmoreland, in the state of Pennsylvania, and was there admitted to record; but it does not appear, nor is it even alleged, to have been at any time proved in the state of Virginia, or in the state of Ohio, where the lands in controversy lie.

At the time of the death of William Crawford, lands lying in Virginia were transmissible by last will and testament, in writing, the same being signed by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his direction, and if not wholly written by himself, being attested by two or more credible witnesses, in his presence. But to give validity and effect to such will, it was necessary that it should be duly proved, and admitted to record, in the court of the county where the testator had his residence at the time of his decease; or, if he had no place of residence in that state, then in the court of the county where the land devised lay, or it might be proved in the general court, where the land was of a certain value. Subsequent to the death of William Crawford, an act of Assembly was passed, which permitted authen- 202*] ticated *copies of wills, proved in any other state of the Union, or abroad, to be offered for probate in the general court, or in the Circuit, County, or Corporation Court, where the whole of the estate lies.

By the law of the state of Ohio lands lying in that state may be devised by last will and testament, or writing; but before such will can be considered as valid in law, it must be presented to the Court of Common Pleas of the county where the land lies, for probate, and be proved by at least two of the subscribing witnesses. If the will be proved, and recorded, in another state, according to the laws of that state, an authenticated copy of the will may be offered for probate in the court of the county where the land lies, without proof by the witnesses; but it is liable to be contested by the heir-at-law, as the original might have been.

It is an acknowledged principle of law, that the title and disposition of real property is exclusively subject to the laws of the country where it is situated, which can alone prescribe the mode by which a title to it can pass from one person to another. For the establishment of this doctrine, it will be sufficient to cite the cases of The United States v. Crosby, 7 Cranch's Rep. 115, and Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. Rep. 565. It follows, therefore, that no estate could pass to the daughters of William Crawford, under his will, until the same should be duly proved according to the laws of Virginia, where the land to which he was entitled lay, at 203*] the time of his death, or *of the territory of Ohio, after the cession by Virginia to the United States, under the ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, or according to the law of that state, which has already been recited. The probate of the will in the state of Pennsylvania gave it no validity whatever in respect to these lands, as to which this court is bound to consider Crawford as having died intestate, and, consequently, that they descended to John Crawford, his only son and heir-at-law, according to the law of Virginia, as it stood in the year 1782. The court below, then, could do no less than dismiss the bill as against this defendant, upon the ground that the complainants had shown no title whatever, legal or equitable, to the land in controversy.

This court might be induced to yield to the application of the counsel for the appellants, that, in case of an affirmance, it should be without prejudice, if we could perceive, from the record, that the complainants could, in another suit, present their case under a more favorable aspect. But this the answer of Findley will not permit us to anticipate; for, even if an authenticated copy of Crawford's will should hereafter be offered for probate, and admitted to record in the state of Ohio, still, the title to be derived under it could not be permitted to overreach the legal title of this defendant, founded, as it is, upon an equitable title, acquired bona fide, and for a valuable consideration paid, which purchase, payment and acquisition of legal title were made before he had either legal or constructive notice of the *will, or [*204 of the claim of the daughters, for we are all of opinion that the probate of the will in Pennsylvania cannot be considered as constructive notice to any person of the devise of the lands in controversy. The decree of the court below must therefore be affirmed generally, with costs.

WRIGHT, Plaintiff in Error,
DENN, ex dem. PAGE, Defendant in Error.

J. P., by his last will, after certain pecuniary legacies, devised as follows: "Item, I give and bequeath unto my loving wife M., all the rest of my lands and tenements whatsoever, whereof I shall die seized in possession, reversion, or remainder, provided she has no lawful issue. Item, I give and bequeath unto M., my beloved wife, whom I likewise constitute, make and ordain my sole executrix of this my last will and testatment, all and singular my lands, messuages and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed," etc. "and I make my loving friend, H. J., executor of this my will, to take care, and see the same performed, according to my true intent and meaning," etc. The testator died seized without issue, and, after the death of the testator, his wife M. married one G. W., by whom she had lawful issue. Held, that she took an estate for life only under the will of her husband, J. P.

Where there are no words of limitation to a devise, the general rule of law is, that the devisee takes an estate for life only, unless, from the language there used, or from other parts of the will, there is a plain intention to give a larger estate.

To make a pecuniary legacy a charge upon lands devised, there must be express words, or a plain implication from the words of the will.

*ERROR to the Circuit Court of New [*205 Jersey.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below. The sole question arising upon the state of facts in the cause, was upon the construction of the will of James Page, made on the 15th of February, 1774. By that will, after the usual introductory clause, the testator proceeds as follows: "Item, I give and bequeath unto my beloved sister, Rebecca, £100, proclamation money, to be paid in four years after my decease.

"Item, I give and bequeath unto my beloved sister Hannah, the sum of £50, proclamation money, to be paid when she is of age.

"Item, I give and bequeath unto my loving wife Mary, all the rest of my lands and tenements whatsoever, whereof I shall die seized, in possession, reversion or remainder, provided she has no lawful issue.

And I make *my loving friend, Henry Jeans, of the county and province aforesaid mentioned, executor of this my will, to take care and see the same performed, according to my true intent and meaning; and for his pains," (leaving the sentence incomplete.) "In witness whereof," etc., (in the common form of attestation). The testator was seized of the land in controversy at the time of the will, and died seized, without issue, on the 10th day of October, 1774, leaving his wife Mary, the devisee, who afterwards married one George Williamson, by whom she had lawful issue still living and died in the year 1811. The lessor of the plaintiff is the brother of the testator, and his only heir-at-law. The defendant claims title to the premises as a purchaser under Mary, the wife of the testator.

The title of the testator to the premises was derived from a devise in the will of his father, John Page, dated the 11th of November, 1773. That will, among other things, contained the following clause: "Item, I give and devise unto my son James, one equal half part of my land (comprising the land in controversy), with all my plantation, utensils, etc., etc., to him, his heirs and assigns, forever." He then gives the other moiety of the land to his son John, to him, his heirs and assigns. He then bequeaths several legacies to his daughters, Sarah and Mary, and adds: "Item, I give and bequeath to my three daughters, Rebecca, Hannah, and Abigail, Rebecca the sum of £50, Hannah and Abigail the sum of £50 each of them. Likewise *it is my will, that my son James do [*207 pay Hannah and Abigail the said sum of fifty pounds each, when they come of age." He then concludes his will by appointing an executor, and revoking all former wills, etc.; and died soon afterwards. James (the son) left no other real estate than that devised to him by this will. What personal estate he or his father left, at the times of their decease, was not found in the case; and, therefore, it did not appear whether or not it was sufficient to pay the legacies in their wills.

The court below gave judgment for the lessor of the plaintiff, who was the heir-at-law of the testator, and the cause was brought, by writ of error, to this court.

Mr. Wood, for the plaintiff in error, contended that Mary, the wife of the testator, took a fee-simple under the devise.

It was admitted that a devise of land, without any technical words of limitation, or explanatory words, gives only an estate for life. But the intention of the testator will supersede this rule, and is the polar star to guide in the construction of wills. The local legislature were so impressed with the good sense of this principle, that, in 1783, a few years after the making this will, they passed a statute, declaring that a devise of lands should pass a fee, unless it was expressed to be for life only. Courts ought, therefore, to be liberal in considering the explanatory words and circumstances relied on to show an intention to devise the fee; by so doing, they further the intention *of the testator.[1] Greater [*208 certainty is not attained by a rigid than by a liberal construction of devises. The only mode of arriving at certainty is, by admitting a general devise to pass a fee, or by requiring strict technical words of limitation. The Legacies in money may be charged upon real estate without express direction of the will, if the intention of the testator to do so can fairly be gathered from all the provisions of the will, and extraneous circumstances may be considered in aid of the terms of the will. Hoyt v. Hoyt, 12 N. Y. Week. Dig. 279.

Where, on a devise of land, the devisees were required to pay specific legacies, they were held to be a charge on the land. Moraney v. Quarles, 1 McLean, 194.

A devise to the testator's son, with a provision that his son "shall pay all just debts out of the estate herein given to him as aforesaid," creates a charge on the estate in the hands of the devisee. Potter v. Gardner, 12 Wheat. 498.

The words "after my debts and funeral charges are paid, I devise and bequeath as follows," etc., amount to a charge upon the real estate of the testator for payment of his debts. Fenwick v. Chapman, 9 Pet. 461; Wright v. West, 1 Cranch, C. C. 303; McCulloch v. McLain, 1 Cranch, C. C. 304.

Where a testator devised to one of his two sons in fee two-third parts of a certain farm, with the limitation that all his just debts should be paid out of said estate, held, that the debts were not merely a charge on the devisee, but were also a charge on the land devised. Though the real estate be charged, yet the personal estate is in general the proper fund for the payment of debts and legacies, and is to be applied before resorting to the real property. Lupton v. Lupton, 2 John. Ch. 614; McKay v. Green, 3 John. Ch. 56; Hawley v. James, 5 Paige, 318, 448, 469; Hunter v. Hunter, 17 Barb. 25.

It has been declared in many cases in this country that the real estate is never to be charged with the payment of the legacies, unless the intention of the testator so to charge it, is either expressly declared or fairly and satisfactorily to be inferred from the language of the will. Stevens v. Gregg, 10 Gill. & John, 148; Tessier v. Wyse, 3 Bland.

notion that descent is the general rule, and devise the exception, is more specious than solid. They are both distinct, co-ordinate rules.

He would first examine the clauses of the devise in question separately, and then consider their combined operation.

The words, "all the rest of my lands and tenements, whatsoever, whereof I shall die seized, in possession, reversion or remainder," etc., are sufficient to pass a fee. The words "rest," and "in reversion or remainder," ought not to be rejected, if a meaning can be discovered for them. The devise of all the rest of his lands to his wife, clearly imports that the previous pecuniary legacies shall be a charge on the lands, and that his wife shall be entitled to whatever interest remains after the legacies are paid. A charge on lands may be implied in a will.[1] An estate tail in lands may be created by implication from a proviso,[2] a fortiori, a charge may be 209*] implied. *These lands were already charged in the hands of the testator with the payment of other legacies, by the will of his father, John P., and which were not then due. The clause in question then is, as it purports to be, a general residuary clause, in which the testator means to devise all his remaining interest in his real property. He could not have meant the rest of his lands by way of local description, for he had devised none before; but he meant all the remaining interest in the lands after the legacies were deducted. Wherever it appears that the testator intended to devise all his interest in land, a fee-simple passes.[3] This rule applies with increased force to residuary clauses, in which a greater latitude of construction is allowed.[4] Though the words "lands and tenements" are strictly descriptive of locality, yet, in connection with other expressions, especially in a residuary clause, they may refer to the quantity of interest or estate.[5] The words, "in remainder or reversion," aid the construction. Though the testator might not have been acquainted with the precise technical distinction between them, yet he must have known they *meant an estate in expectancy. [*210 The case of Norton v. Ladd[6] is very analogous to the present, and shows that a fee was intended.

If it be established that the testator referred to his interest or estate in the farm in question in this clause, it carries all his interest, i. e., a fee-simple, because it is residuary, and the language is broad and comprehensive enough for the purpose.

Again, the proviso, "provided she has no lawful issue," shows an intention in the testator to give a fee to his wife. This is a condition precedent to take effect at the time of his death. (1) Because the terms used ordinarily import a condition precedent. Where there is nothing in the nature of the proviso, or in respect to the time of its performance, to show that a condition subsequent was intended, it is always construed a condition precedent. (2) All the circumstances of the case show that the testator intended the condition to take effect at his death, and to be precedent; for then the issue the devisee might have would be his own child and heir. If it be contended that this proviso refers to children the devisee might have by a future husband, the testator is made guilty of the absurdity of intending that, if his wife should marry again, she might retain the land, but if she should have issue by such marriage, she should forfeit it. The devise to the wife in this case was intended to be a substitute for the descent to the *heir. Whenever a [*211 devise of land is intended as a substitute for a fee, the substituted devise is a fee.[7] A court may discover, in a condition, the effect of which is, in a certain event, to defeat the estate, an intent, when the estate actually vests, to enlarge the disposition to a fee. Thus, as before shown, a devise may be enlarged to an estate tail by the terms of a condition.[8]

The authorities are very numerous which illustrate the subject, and the distinctions are often extremely nice. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. s. 1245, s. 1246; Dover v. Gregory, 10 Sim. 393; Parker v. Doubtful words in a will are not to operate the exemption of the testator's personal property from the payment of debts, and the charging them on the real estate. Seaver v. Lewis, 14 Mass. 83.

Where two estates are blended, the real estate is equally chargeable with the personal. Adams v. Brackett, 5 Metc. 280; Bench v. Miles, 4 Madd. 187; Hassanclever v. Tucker, 2 Binn. 525; Whitman v. Norton, 6 Binn. 395; Tracy v. Tracy, 15 Barb. 503.

In order to charge the real estate with the payment of legacies there must be something, either in the terms of the will itself, or in the proof of extrinsic circumstances, in addition to the usual formula of the residuary clause, by which the intention is expressly declared, or from which it is to be clearly and satisfactorily inferred. Unaided and alone the words "all the rest and residue of my real and personal estate not before disposed of" are insufficient for that purpose. Babcock v. Stoddard, 3 Thomp. & Cook, N. Y. 207; Myers v. Eddy, 47 Barb. 264; Gridley v. Andrews, 8 Conn. 5; Lupton v. Lupton, 2 John Ch. 614. See Keeling v. Brown, 5 Ves. 361; Kightley v. Kightley, 2 Ves. 328; Roper on Legacies, 6; Markant v. Twisden, Gilb. Eq. 30; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 16 N. Y. 127; Taylor v. Dodd, 2 Thomp. & Cook, N. Y. 88.

While the general rule is that the personal estate of the testator is to furnish the fund for the payment of legacies, it may be entirely exonerated, or the real estate may be made to aid, if there be express directions to that effect in the will, or if that be the clear intent to be gathered from its provisions. Taylor v. Dodd, 58 N. Y. 335.

But, to leave no doubt of his intention, the testator, in the next sentence, gives the devisee his land, "to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed." He drops the peculiar phraseology of the former clause, and takes up new language, manifestly for the purpose of enlarging the subject of his bounty. A life estate is susceptible only of a partial and limited enjoyment. The words "freely to be enjoyed," have been held sufficient to carry a fee.[1] The idea that these words, as used in the present case, give a life estate dispunishable for waste, is wholly inadmissible. It would be creating a state of things which would make the interest of the tenant at variance with the permanent improvement of the soil, and, consequently, of the best interests of the country. It would be his interest to commit waste, and to destroy the property. The testator could not have meant 212*] that the devisee should hold the lands *as tenant for life, dispunishable for waste merely; for that would only exempt the property devised from one kind of restriction, when he manifestly contemplates a free enjoyment generally, without any restriction whatever. The free enjoyment is not annexed to the estate devised, but to the land. It is the land which is to be freely enjoyed. The estate is only the technical medium through which that free enjoyment is secured, and the court will see that the devisee takes such an estate as is compatible with a free enjoyment.

But even supposing these different clauses, taken separately, should be deemed inadequate to pass a fee, yet, taken conjointly, they form a body of evidence, strong and conclusive, to show that the testator intended to devise his entire interest in the lands. It is impossible to suppose that a plain man would have used such phraseology merely to give his farm to his wife for her life. All the clauses may be taken together, and receive their full, combined effect. Juncta valent.[2]

Mr. Webster and Mr. Cox, contra, contended that under the will of James Page, nothing more passed to the devisee than an estate for life. The plaintiff below claimed as heir-at-law. The title was, prima facie, in him. It was admitted on all hands that the devise contains no words of limitation sufficient to pass the inheritance. It is a general rule, that in or- 213*] der to create an estate in *fee, words of inheritance, as "heirs," must be employed. Wherever an estate is granted, either specifically for the life of the grantee, or without any limitation, the legal presumption is, that the design was to create an estate for life only. In wills a greater latitude has been allowed. The intention of the testator, expressed in clear, unambiguous terms, will carry the fee. But the rules of conveyance at common law still operate, although not so rigorously, even in regard to wills; and, before the heir can be disinherited, there must be, not merely an intention, but an intention legally preceptible, in an instrument legally executed. The only difference between wills and deeds is, that in the latter, certain specific technical terms are essential; in the other, any words legally indicating the clear intention of the testator, are sufficient.

The intent must be clearly expressed, for it is a fundamental rule in the construction of wills, that the heir cannot be disinherited without express words, or necessary implication.[3] This intention must also be expressed in language at least quasi technical; for it is perfectly immaterial how plain it may be that the design of the testator was to pass a larger estate, unless that intention be manifest to the legal eye.[4]

As the construction now contended for by the plaintiff in error would disinherit the heir-at-law, *and vest the inheritance in a stran- [*214 ger, it is incumbent upon him to establish one or the other of these two propositions:

1. That there are express words creating an estate in fee in the devisee (which is not pretended, and which, if actually existing, would preclude all argument), or,

2. An intent so clearly expressed as to require, by necessary implication, that such an estate should pass.

The circumstance that no words exist in this will, which, by their intrinsic force, carry any larger estate than for life, raises a legal presumption that no larger interest was intended to pass. If the testator had designed the heirs or issue of his wife as the objects of his bounty, some language indicating such an intention would have been used. If, in addition to this negative circumstance, we find that these persons in that capacity were present to the mind of the testator, and yet are not made objects of his bounty, it superadds a positive weight to the legal presumption that they were not designed to be so, and that their omission was not merely accidental.

There being, then, no express words carrying the fee, let us examine those particular expressions which are relied upon to show the actual intent that the fee should pass. These words are: (1) "All the rest of my lands and tenements." (2) The words "reversion or remainder." (3) The words "freely to be possessed and enjoyed."

1. As to the words, "all the rest of my lands *and tenements." One of the earliest [*215 cases in which the effect of similar words came under consideration, was that of Wilkinson v. Maryland.[5] There, A, being seized of divers lands in A, B and C, the lands in C being in him by mortgage forfeited, devised the lands in A and B to several persons, and then devised "all the rest of the goods, chattels, leases, estates and mortgages whereof he was possessed" to his wife, after his debts and legacies paid, made his wife executrix, and died. The question was, whether the fee passed to the wife by this devise; and it was held that an estate for life only passed. In that case, there were several circumstances rendering it stronger in favor of a fee than the present. (1) There was a previous clause devising part of the property, and there was, therefore, an antecedent to which the word "rest" could relate. Here there is no such prior clause, and the word "rest" is senseless, or the testator attaches to it his own peculiar signification. (2) The devise of the real property is there in the same clause which contains a bequest of the personalty; and, therefore, the inference as to the testator's intention was irresistable, that he designed to give the same interest, i. e., an absolute interest, in all the subjects of the devise. (3) In the case cited, the word "estate" is employed as the descriptive term, which is a word frequently held sufficient of itself, proprio vigore, to carry a fee.

216*] The case of Canning v. Canning,[1] is very similar to the present. There the words of the will were: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my messuages, lands or hereditaments, etc., after my just debts, legacies, and funeral expenses first paid, I give to my executors in trust for my daughters." It was adjudged that the executors took only an estate for life; and, notwithstanding the general character of Mosely, as an inaccurate reporter, this case has been frequently recognized as law.[2] This is evidently a much stronger case than the one now before the court. (1) It is properly a residuary devise; this is not. (2) It contained the term "hereditaments," emphatically embracing the inheritance, according to the opinion of many eminent lawyers. (3) The estate was devised "after debts, legacies, and funeral expenses first paid." Yet, under all these circumstances, it was held that the words "rest, residue and remainder of my messuages, lands or hereditaments," so much stronger and more comprehensive that those of the present testator, were merely descriptive. The ground of that determination was, that the words "rest, residue and remainder," being unaccompanied by any words of limitation, could not operate on the inheritance.[3] This applies, with at least equal force, to the present case. In Peiton v. Banks,[4] where one devised to his wife for life, 217] and the *reversion to A and B, to be equally divided, etc., it was decreed that they were tenants in common for life only. That case, and the one referred to by Sergeant Maynard, were stronger than the present, since the freehold having been already disposed of, it might have been plausibly argued that the term "reversion" there used, ex vi termini, necessarily included the inheritance. In this case no such argument would apply, the word "rest" being without an antecedent, and being a term more appropriate, as descriptive of the subject than of the quantity of interest. In Doe v. Richards,[5] where, after bequeathing a certain leasehold estate, the testator devised "all the rest, residue and remainder of my messuages, lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels and personal estate whatsoever," the court held that these words were not sufficient to carry the fee. The property thus devised being, however, made subject to a charge, this circumstance was held sufficient, although the propriety of that part of the decision seems to have been questioned.[6] But the authority of the case, so far as it determines that these words were insufficient, of themselves, to pass the fee, has never been controverted. In that case, the clause was properly a reversionary clause, a previous devise having been made, leaving a reversionary interest to be disposed of. There also the word "hereditament" was used; neither of which circumstances exist here.

*The next case is that of Den v. [*218 Moor,[7] which deserves the more weight as an authority, because a second action was afterwards brought on the same title; the judgment rendered in the K. B. reversed in the Exchequer;[8] and that judgment afterwards reversed in the House of Lords, and the original judgment in the K. B. affirmed.[9] It may therefore be presumed to have been thoroughly examined and considered. In that case, the testator having first devised a life interest in a copyhold messuage, then uses these words: "All the rest of my lands, tenements and hereditaments, either freehold or copyhold, whatsoever and wheresoever, my goods, chattels and personal estate, of what nature or kind soever, after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath the same unto my wife, S. C., and I do hereby nominate and appoint her, my said wife, sole executrix of this my will." In delivering the opinion of the twelve judges, Macdonald, C. B., states the question arising under that will to be: "Whether the words are materially distinguishable from those used in other wills, and which have been held not to denote an intention so expressed by the testator, as to enlarge that which would otherwise be an estate for life only, into a fee." He then states that this would depend upon the effect of the word "rest," of the word "hereditaments," and of the provision "after payment of my just debts *and funeral expenses." He considers [*219 Canning v. Canning as decisive of the question on the two first words. These two cases must therefore be considered as decisive in settling the construction to be given to this part of the present will; in which the phraseology used is still less indicative of an intent to pass the inheritance. The word "hereditaments," found there, is wanting here; a word which, in Lydcott v. Willows, Powell, J., considered as sufficient to carry the fee, and this opinion was unanimously confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber.[10] So, also, Lord Holt considered it as sufficient to pass the fee, in Smith v. Tindal;[11] and in Frogmorton v. Wright, Lord (C. J.) De Gray held it might have that operation.[12]

Notwithstanding these decisions, however, the law, as recognized in Canning v. Canning, is considered as settled in Westminster Hall, and the word "hereditaments" is now held insufficient to pass the fee.

The case of Markant v. Twisden,[13] is, in many respects, analogous to that now before the court. A, having settled all his freeholds on his wife for life, as a jointure, bequeathed several legacies, and then says: "All the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, I give to my wife, whom I make sole executrix." Held, that the reversion of the jointure lands did not pass, but the personal estate only. The reason 220*] assigned *appears decisive of the present question, "for, as the testator devised no real estate, there could be no residue." So, in the present case, the whole effect of the words "rest," "remainder" and "reversion." If it should be thought that in themselves tney have any to denote an estate larger than one for life) is destroyed: (1) By the circumstances that there was no previous disposition of any real estate in the will, and, therefore, this is not a residuary clause. (2) By the circumstance that the testator was seized of no estate in reversion or remainder, which could pass under these words, and, therefore, they are wholly inoperative. (3) It is perfectly manifest that the words in question were used simply as descriptive of the subject-matter, and not of the interest in that subject-matter. In this view the case has a strong resemblance to Pettiward v. Prescott,[1] where the testator devised as follows: "I give to R. P. my copyhold estate at P., consisting of three tenements, and now under lease to A. B." The master of the rolls, after showing, from a variety of adjudged cases, that the word "estate" is sufficient to carry the fee in general, yet decides that the devisee took only a life interest, on the ground that the testator, by the word in that case, did not mean to speak of the quantity of the legal interest, but merely of the corpus or subject in the disposition.

As corroborating the construction of the words "reversion and remainder," now in- 221*] sisted on, it may *be observed, in the statute of wills of the 32d Hen. VIII., c. 1, it was enacted, "that all and every person and persons having manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments, may give and dispose of them," etc. Afterwards, the stat. 34 and 35 Hen. VIII., c. 5, entitled, "An act for the explanation of wills," was passed. This statute recites that several doubts, questions and ambiguities had arisen upon the previous statute, and enacts, that "all and singular persons having a sole estate, or interest in fee-simple, etc., of or in any manors, lands, tenements, rents or other hereditaments, in possession, reversion, remainder, etc., shall have full and free liberty to give, dispose, will," etc. In the first statute, it seemed to be thought that the language implied a present vested estate in the devisor, in order to give validity to this form of disposition. The ambiguity was removed by the second statute, which gave the right, whether the party was seized in possession or in expectancy. The statute, then, authorizes a testator to devise an estate in which he has no present, but only a reversionary interest; but the same language must be used to carry the fee, as if the estate were in possession. The subjects capable of being devised are enlarged, but the form of the instrument is not altered. A reversionary interest, like a possessory interest, may be for life, for years, in tail, or in fee; and it is equally important that these different quantities of interest should be designated by the will in the one case as in the other. The *case [*222 of Ager v. Poole,[2] shows this construction to be correct; and Pelton v. Banks,[3] is to the same effect. Both of these cases are stronger than the present, for in each of them the testator had such a future interest as he described.

As to the words, "provided she has no lawful issue," the argument on the other side is, that they imply a condition precedent. To this it is answered, (1) that if a condition precedent to the vesting of any estate in the wife, the proviso should be entirely at variance with the whole design of the testator. He evidently intended an immediate interest to pass to the wife, which could not take place if the fact that she should have no lawful issue is to be a condition precedent. That could only be ascertained by her dying without issue. (2) If it be a condition precedent, she took no estate, because she, in point of fact, had lawful issue. To obviate these conclusions, an interpolation is made in the will, and the testator is presumed to have said, lawful issue by himself. The answer is, that such a presumption is not warranted by the language employed. The case of Norton v. Ladd turns upon the extent to be given to the expression "whole remainder," after a disposition of a life estate in all the lands, and the interest of an heir-at-law was not involved. Lambert's Lessee v. Paine turns upon the meaning to be attached to the word "estate." Wheeler v. Waldron is deprived of *much of its authority by a remark [*223 made in a note to Chester v. Chester.[4]

As to the second clause of the will, which contains the words, "to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed," the legal signification of this phraseology has been frequently settled. In Loveacres v. Blight,[5] is a clause to this effect: "Item, to my two sons, T. M. and R. M., whom I make and ordain my sole executors, all my lands and tenements freely to be possessed and enjoyed alike." In this case there were: (1) Introductory words, which Lord Mansfield always considered as entitled to much weight. (2) There was a charge, and he thought it but reasonable to infer an intention to pass a fee, because that alone would enable the devisees to comply with the testator's directions fully and completely. (3) Freely to be enjoyed, he considered, in that case, as meaning absolutely, because, having charged the estate, it could not mean free from incumbrances. None of these circumstances exist here, and, therefore, the case is not analogous, and cannot warrant the same construction. The case of Goodright v. Barron,[6] more nearly resembles the case before the court. There, after the introductory words, "as touching my worldly estate," the testator devised to B, whom he made his executrix, "all and singular his lands, messuages and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed. These are the identical words here employed, and no other distinction *exists between the cases, [*224 than that here are no introductory words (sometimes so important), yet the court held that the fee did not pass.

The only other ground on which it can be presumed that the testator intended a fee, is the circumstance that this devise is after certain legacies; and it is said that "all the rest," etc., means that the devisee was to take the real estate subject to the payment of these legacies. Admitting that wherever the testator employs language of an indefinite kind, prescribing no limits to the estate devised, and burthens the devisee with a gross, but certain charge, that the fee will pass, that rule of construction is inapplicable here, because, (1) there is no disposition of the personal estate, the appropriate fund for the payment of legacies. (2) There is, at most, only an implied charge upon the real estate; and it seems unreasonable to require the court to imply a charge, for no other purpose than to furnish a ground for raising another implication still more serious.

Admitting the verbal construction of the opposite counsel to be correct, the case of Jackson v. Harris[1] is decisive against the conclusion they would infer from it. If a charge at all, it is a contingent charge. The personal property is applicable in the first instance, and there is only a possibility that it will prove insufficient. A contingent charge is not sufficient to carry a fee. Besides, supposing 225*] the whole of these legacies *to be payable out of the real estate, the conclusion contended for would not result. The rule of law is, that where the charge is upon the estate, and not upon the person of the devisee in respect of the estate, no fee passes by implication.[2] So much of the estate as is sufficient to raise the sum required, is not given to the devisee at all. The residue is devised perfectly unfettered. Canning v. Canning, Den v. Moore and Den v. Allen, were all cases in which the real estate was given after payment of debts, etc., and yet held not a fee.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The principal question arising in this case is, what estate Mary, the wife of James Page, took under his will; whether an estate for life or in fee. If the former, then the judgment of the Circuit Court is to be affirmed; if the latter, then it is to be reversed.

Some reliance has been placed upon the will of John Page, the father, to show the predicament of the land in the possession of his son James, and thence to draw aid in the construction of the will of the latter. Without doubt, James took a fee in the moiety devised to him by his father (which includes the land in controversy), for it is given "to him, his heirs 226*] and assigns." *But it is argued that the land came into his hands charged with the legacies payable to his sisters Hannah and Abigail, and as these legacies were not payable until they came of age, they remained a charge upon the land in the hands of James at his death. Whether the sisters were of age at his death or not, or had received their legacies or not, does not appear from the statement of facts, and nothing can be presumed either way. But what is there to show that these legacies were a charge on the land? The direction in the will is, that "James do pay Hannah and Abigail the said sum of £50 each when they come of age;" but it is not said or implied anywhere in the will, that these legacies shall be a charge on the land. The direction is personal, and must be a charge on the person only, unless it can be shown, from other parts of the will, that the testator intended a charge on the land. A testator may devise lands with a view to legacies, and make them a charge on the land, or on the person of the devisee, or on both;[3] and whether a particular legacy be in either predicament, must depend upon the language of the will. In the large class of cases which have been decided on this subject, and which has principally arisen from questions respecting the quantity of the estate taken by the devisee, the ground assumed has been that the will must speak expressly, or by fair implication, *that the testator in- [*227 tends the legacies to be a charge on the land. When, therefore, the testator orders legacies to be paid out of his lands, or where, subject to legacies, or after payment of legacies, he devises his lands, courts have held the land charged with the legacies upon the manifest intention of the testator. But here there is no such language. There is no direction that the devisee shall pay the legacies out of the land. The charge is personal; and the case falls directly within the authority of Reeves v. Gower, in 11 Mod. Rep. 208.

We may, then, proceed to the consideration of the will of James Page, inasmuch as that of his father affords no light to guide us in the construction. The grounds mainly relied on to establish that Mary, the wife of the testator, took a fee, are, that the legacies given to his sisters are a charge on his real estate in the hands of his widow; that all the rest of his "lands and tenements," in possession, reversion or remainder, are given; that the devise is subject to the proviso, "that she has no lawful issue," which is not a condition merely, but a substitution for an estate intended for his children; and, finally, that the lands, etc., are devised to her "freely to be possessed and enjoyed," which words are best satisfied upon the supposition of a fee.

Before proceeding to the particular examination of the legal effect of these different clauses in the will, it is necessary to state that, where there are no words of limitation to a devise, the general rule of law is, that the devisee takes an *estate for life only, [*228 unless from the language there used, or from other parts of the will, there is a plain intention to give a larger estate. We say a plain intention, because, if it be doubtful or conjectural upon the terms of the will, or if full legal effect can be given to the language without such an estate, the general rule prevails. It is not sufficient that the court may entertain a private belief that the testator intended a fee; it must see that he has expressed that intention with reasonable certainty on the face of his will. For the law will not suffer the heir to be disinherited upon conjecture. He is favored by its policy; and though the testator may disinherit him, yet the law will execute that intention only when it is put in a clear and unambiguous shape.

In the present case, there is no introductory clause in the will expressing an intention to dispose of the whole of the testator's estate. Nor is it admitted that such a clause, if it were inserted, would so far attach itself to a subsequent devising clause, as per se to enlarge the latter to a fee, where the words would not ordinarily import it. Such a doctrine would be repugnant to the modern as well as ancient authorities. The cases of Frogmorton v. Wright, 2 W. Bl. 889, Right v. Sidebottom, Dougl. 759, Child v. Wright, 8 D. & E. 64, Denn v. Gaskin, Cowper, 657, Doe v. Allen, 8 D. & E. 497, and Merson v. Blackmore, 2 Atk. 341, are full to the point. The most that can be said is, that where the words of the devise admit of passing a greater interest than 229*] for life, courts will lay *hold of the introductory clause, to assist them in ascertaining the intention. The case of Hogan v. Jackson, Cowper, 297, admits this doctrine. That case itself did not turn upon the effect of the introductory clause, but upon the other words of the will, which were thought sufficient to carry the fee, particularly the words, "all my effects, both real and personal." The case of Grayson v. Atkinson, 1 Wils. Rep. 333, admits of the same explanation; and, besides, the inheritance was there charged with debts and legacies.

There is no doubt that a charge on lands may be created by implication, as well as by an express clause in a will. But then the implication must be clear upon the words. Where is there any such implication in the present will? The testator has not disposed of the whole of his personal estate, which is the natural fund for the payment of legacies; non constat, how much or how little he left. For aught that appears, the personal estate may greatly have exceeded all the legacies; and if it did not, that would be no sufficient reason to charge them on the land. It is not a sound interpretation of a will, to construe charges which ordinarily belong to the personalty, to be charges on the realty, simply because the original fund is insufficient. The charge must be created by the words of the will. Now, from what words are we to infer such a charge in this case? It is said, from the words "all the rest;" but "all the rest" of what? Certainly not of the personal estate, 230*] because the words immediately *following are, "of my lands and tenements," which exclude the personalty. The words "all the rest" have, then, no appropriate meaning in reference to the personal estate, for the connection prohibits it. Can they then be supposed to import "all the rest of my lands, etc., after payment of the legacies," and so be a charge on them? This would certainly be going much farther than the words themselves authorize, and much farther than any preceding clause requires or justifies. A charge of legacies on land would not be a devise of the real estate in the ordinary understanding of men, nor in the contemplation of law. It would make them a lien on, and payable out of, the land; but it would still be distinguishable from an estate in the land. But it is sufficient for us to declare that we cannot make these legacies a charge on the land, except by going beyond, and not by following, the language of the will; we must create the charge, and not merely recognize it. The case of Markant v. Twisden, Gilb. Eq. Rep. 30, was much stronger than the present. There, the testator had settled all his freeholds on his wife for life, as a jointure; and by his will be bequeathed several legacies, and then followed this clause, "all the rest and residue of my estate, chattels, real and personal, I give to my wife, who I make sole executrix." But the court held that the wife did not take the reversion of the jointure by the devise, for as the testator had not in the preceding part of the will devised any *real estate, there [*231 could be no residue of real estate on which the clause could operate.

But, admitting that the present legacies were a charge on the lands of the testator, this would not be sufficient to change the wife's estate into a fee. The clearly established doctrine on this subject is, that if the charge be merely on the land, and not on the person of the devisee, then the devisee, upon a general devise, takes an estate for life only. The reason is obvious. If the charge be merely on the estate, then the devisee (to whom the testator is always presumed to intend a benefit) can sustain no loss or detriment in case the estate is construed but a life estate, since the estate is taken subject to the incumbrance. But if the charge be personal on the devisee, then if his estate be but for life, it may determine before he is re-imbursed for his payments, and thus he may sustain a serious loss. All the cases turn upon this distinction. Canning v. Canning, Moseley's Rep. 240, Loveacres v. Blight, Cowp. Rep. 352; Denn, ex dem. Moor v. Mellor, 5 D. & E. 558, and 2 Bos. & Pull. 227; Doe v. Holmes, 8 D. & E. 1; Goodtitle v. Madden, 4 East's Rep. 496, all recognize it. And Doe & Palmer v. Richards, 3 D. & E. 356, proceeds upon it, whatever exception may be thought to lie to the application of it in that particular case. We are then of opinion that there is no charge of the present legacies on the land; and, if there were, no inference could be drawn from this circumstance to enlarge *the estate of the wife to a fee,[*232 since they are not made a personal charge upon her.

The next consideration is, whether the words, "all the rest of my lands and tenements," &c., import a fee. In the first place, this clause is open to the objection that it is not a residuary clause in the will, for no estate in the lands is previously given, and, consequently, if it operates at all on the fee, it gives the entire inheritance, and not a mere residuum of interest. And if a devise of "all the rest and residue of lands," in a clear residuary clause, was sufficient to carry a fee by their own import, it would follow that almost every will containing a residuary clause would be construed, without words of limitation, to pass a fee. Yet, the contrary doctrine has most assuredly been maintained. In Canning v. Canning, Moseley, 240, the testator devised as follows: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my messuages, lands, etc., after my just debts, legacies, etc., are fully satisfied and paid, I give to my executors in trust for my daughters;" and the question was, whether these words passed an estate in fee, or for life, to the executors. The court decided that they passed a life estate only. The authority of this case was fully established in Moor v. Denn, ex dem. Mellor, 2 Bos. & Pull. 247, in the House of Lords where words equally extensive occurred; and the authority of this last case has never been broken in upon.

The cases which seem at first view to interfere with and control this doctrine, will be 233*] found upon close examination to turn on other points. Thus, in Palmer v. Richards, 3 D. & E. 356, where there was a devise of "all the rest and residue of the testator's lands," etc., his legacies and personal expenses being thereout paid, Lord Kenyon admitted that the words "rest and residue," etc., were not sufficient to carry a fee; but he relied on the subsequent words, "legacies, etc.," being thereout paid," which he considered as creating a charge upon the lands in the hands of the devisee, of such a nature as to carry a fee. In this opinion the court concurred; and, though this case has been since questioned, on its own circumstances, its general doctrine remains untouched. So, in the case of Norton v. Ladd, 1 Lutw. 755, 759, where the devise was to A. C., his sister, for life, of all his lands, etc., after the decease of his mother; then to J. C., his brother, the whole remainder of all those lands and tenements," given to A. C. for life, if he survived her; and if not, then "the whole remainder and reversion of all the said lands, etc., to his sisters, C, E and A, and their heirs forever;" the court held that a fee passed to J. C., under the devise, upon the ground, that taking the whole will, the words "whole remainder" properly referred to the estate or interest of the testator undisposed of to his sister A. C.; and that the words could not relate to the quantity of lands which the testator intended to devise to his brother, J. C., for he had plainly devised all his lands to his sister, A. C., and all the lands he had devised 234] to A. C. he had devised to J. C.; *so that the words naturally and properly had relation to the quantity of estate which the testator intended to give J. C., that is, all the remainder, which is the same in effect as all his estate. If the words were merely to be referred to the lands he intended to devise to J. C., they would be ineffectual, for it was impossible that he could have any remainder of lands, when he had devised all to A. C.; so that they must refer to the estate in the lands. Such is the substance of the reasoning of the court, upon which it is unnecessary to say more than that the case turned upon the supposed incongruity of construing the testator's words otherwise than as importing the whole remaining interest in the lands, upon all of which lands a life estate was already attached. And the final devise over, which carried a plain fee to the sisters, being a substitution for the former estate to J. C., in the event of his death before the testator, greatly fortifies this interpretation. This case has been much relied on by the plaintiff in error upon the present argument; but it is very distinguishable from that before the court. There, a life estate was given, and the terms, "whole remainder," had a natural meaning, as embracing the whole remaining interest. Here, on the contrary, there is no preceding interest given in the real estate, and therefore the terms "all the rest" are not susceptible of that sense. There, a substituted estate, in fee, was clearly given; here no clause occurs, leading necessarily to such a conclusion. All that the case in Lutwyche, taken as the fullest authority, *estab- [*235 lishes, is, that the words "rest and residue" may, in certain connections, carry a fee.[1] This is not denied or doubted; but then the words attain their force from their juxtaposition with other words, which fix the sense in which the testator has used them. In Farmer v. Wise, 3 P. Wms. 294, the residuary clause was of "all the rest of his estate, real and personal," and the word "estate" has long been construed to convey a fee. This court have carried the doctrine still farther, and adjudged a devise of "all the estate called Marrowbone," to be a devise of the fee, construing the words, not as words merely of local description, but of the estate or interest also in the land. Lambert's Lessees v. Paine, 3 Cranch's Rep. 79; Murray v. Wise, 2 Vern. Rep. 564; S. C. Prec. in Ch. 246, contained a devise, after a legacy, of all the residue of his real and personal estate, and rests on the same principle as do Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, 2 Vern. Rep. 690, and Ridart v. Paine, 3 Atk. Rep. 486. In Willows v. Lydcott, Carth. Rep. 50; 2 Vent. 285, the residuary devise was to A and her assigns forever, which latter words indicate a clear intention to pass a fee. In Grayson v. Atkinson, 1 Wils. Rep. 333, there was an introductory clause, purporting the intention of the testator to dispose of all his temporal estate, then several legacies were given, and a direction to A to sell any part of his real and *personal estate for payment [*236 of debts and legacies; and then the will says, as to the rest "of my goods and chattels, real and personal, movable and immovable, as houses, gardens, tenements, my share in the copperas works, &c., I give to the said A." Lord Hardwicke, after some hesitation, held it a fee in A, relying upon the introductory clause, and the charge of the debts and legacies on the land, and upon the language of the residuary clause. Whatever may be the authority of this decision, it certainly does not pretend to rest solely on the residuary clause; and its containing a mixed devise of real and personal estate was not insignificant in ascertaining the testator's intention.

It may also be admitted that the words, "lands and tenements," do sometimes carry a fee, and are not confined to a mere local description of the property. But, in their ordinary sense, they import the latter only; and when a more extensive signification is given to them in wills, it arises from the context, and is justified by the apparent intention of the testator to use them in such extensive signification. The cases cited at the bar reach to this extent and no farther. Their authority is not denied; but their application to the present case is not admitted.

We may, then, take it to be the general result of the authorities, that the words "all the rest of my lands" do not, of themselves, import a devise of the fee; but, unless aided by the context, the devisee, whether he be a sole or a residuary *devisee, will, if there be no [*237 words of limitation, take only a life estate.

1.—See Lord Harwicke's comments on this case in Ballis v. Gale, 2 Vesey's Rep. 48.

We next come to the effect of the words, "in possession, reversion or remainder," and, as incidental thereto, the effect of the word "tenements." That the term "remainder," may, in some cases connected with other clauses, carry a fee, has been already admitted, and was the very point in 1 Lutw. 755. The same is true in respect to the word "reversion." This is affirmed in the case of Bailis v. Gale, 2 Ves. Rep. 48, where the devise was, "I give to my son, C. G., the reversion of the tenement my sister now lives in, after her decease, and the reversion of those two tenements now in the possesion of J. C." Lord Hardwicke, in pronouncing judgment, relied on the legal signification of the word "reversion," and that its use by the testator was fairly to be inferred to be in its legal sense, as the whole right of reverter; and he adverted to the circumstance that the devise was to a child, to whom it could scarcely be presumed the parent intended to give merely a dry reversion, or to split up his interest in it into parts. But, in that case, as in 1 Lutw. 755, there were antecedent estates created or existing in the land; and the devise was of a "reversion," and not, as in this case, of "all the rest of my lands, etc., in reversion," etc. The land now in controversy was not held by the testator as a reversionary estate, but as an estate in possession; and in no way, therefore, can the doctrine help the present case. But there are cases which are contrary to Bail-238*] is v. Gale, and somewhat *clash with its authority. In Peiton v. Banks, 1 Vern. Rep. 65, the case was, that a man devised his lands to his wife for life, and he gave the reversion to A and B, to be equally divided betwixt them. The court decided that A and B took an estate as tenants in common for life only. And Sergeant Maynard stated a similar decision to have been made about twenty years before that time. It is not material, however, to enter upon the delicate inquiry, which of these authorities is entitled to most weight, because the present case does not require it.

In respect to the word "tenements," it is only necessary to observe that it has never been construed in a will, independently of other circumstances, to pass a fee. In Canning v. Canning, Moseley's Rep. 240, and Doe, ex dem. Palmer v. Richards, 3 D. & E. 356, Denn, ex dem. Moor v. Miller, 5 D. & E. 558, S. C. 2 Bos. & Pull. 247, the same term occurred, as well as the broader expression, "hereditaments;" in neither case was the term "tenement" supposed to have any peculiar effect; and the argument, attempting to establish a fee upon the import of the word "hereditaments," even in a residuary clause, was deliberately overruled by the court. The same doctrine was held in Hopwell v. Ackland, Salk. Rep. 239.

If, then, it is asked what interpretation the court put upon the words "all the rest," in connection with "lands and tenements," the answer is, that no definite meaning can, in this 239*] will, be *annexed to them. It is our duty to give effect to all the words of a will, if, by the rules of law, it can be done. And where words occur in a will, their plain and ordinary sense is to be attached to them, unless the testator manifestly applies them in some other sense. But, if words are used by him which are insensible in the place where they occur, or their common meaning is deserted, and no other is furnished by the will, courts are driven to the necessity of deeming them as merely insignificant or surplusage, and to find the true interpretation of the will without them. In the present case, the words, "all the rest of my lands and tenements" stand wholly disconnected with any preceding clause. There is nothing to which "the rest" has relation, for no other devise of real estate is made. We have no certain guide to the testator's intention in using them. We may indulge conjectures; but the law does not decide upon conjectures, but upon plain, reasonable, and certain expressions of intention found on the face of the will.

The next clause is, "provided she has no lawful issue." The probable intention of this proviso was, "provided she has no lawful issue" by me. Men do not, ordinarily, look to remote occurrences in the structure of their wills, and especially unlearned men. The testator was young, and his wife young, and it was natural for them not to despair of issue, although, at the time of the will, he was in ill health. In case of leaving children, posthumous or otherwise he might *think [*240 that the gift to his wife of the whole of his real estate would be more than conjugal affection could require, or parental prudence justify. In that event, he might mean to displace the whole estate of his wife, and to leave her to her dower at the common law, and the children to their inheritance by descent. This interpretation would afford a rational exposition of the clause, and, perhaps, ought not to be rejected, although there is no express limitation in the words. In this view, it is not very material whether it be considered as a condition precedent or subsequent, though the general analogies of the law would certainly lead to the conclusion that it was in the latter predicament. But even in this view, which is certainly most favorable to the plaintiffs in error, it falls short of the purposes of the argument. As a condition, in the event proposed, the prior estate to the wife would be defeated; but there would be no estate devised to the issue. They would take by descent as heirs, and not by devise. It would be going quite too far to construe mere words of condition to include a contingent devise to the issue; to infer from words defeating the former estate an intent to create a new estate in the issue, and that estate a fee, and a clear substitute for the former. No court would feel justified, upon so slender a foundation, to establish so broad a superstructure. Nor can any intention to give a fee to the wife be legally deduced from the proviso, in any way of interpreting the terms, because it is as perfectly consistent with the intention *to defeat a life estate, as a [*241 fee in the whole of the lands. The testator, with a limited property, might justly think it too much to take from his own issue the substance of their inheritance during a long minority, in favor of a wife, who might live many years, and form new connections. In such an event, leaving her to the general provision of law, as to dower, would not be unkindness or injustice. But it is sufficient to say that the words are too equivocal to enable the court to ascertain from them the clear purpose of establishing a fee. And if the proviso refers to any lawful issue by any other husband, then it must be deemed a condition subsequent; and in the events which have happened, the estate of the wife, whether it be for life or in fee, has been defeated, and the plaintiffs in error are not entitled to reverse the present judgment. Quacunque via data est, the proviso cannot help the case.

It remains now to consider the succeeding clause of the will, in which the testator repeats his devise, and gives to his wife "all his lands," etc., dropping the words "the rest," and, therefore, showing that he did not understand them as having any other or stronger import than the will presented without them. Then follow the words "by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed," upon which great stress has been laid at the bar. If these words had occurred in a will devising an estate for years, or for life, or in fee, in express terms, they would not, probably, have been thought to have any distinct auxiliary signification, but to be merely a more 242*] full annunciation of what the law would imply. Occurring in a clause where the estate is undefined, they are supposed to have a peculiar force; so that, "freely to possess and enjoy," must mean to possess and enjoy without any limitation or restriction as to estate or right. The argument is, that a tenant for life is restricted in many respects. She can make no permanent improvements or alterations; she is punishable for waste, and is subject to the inquisition of the reversioner. But, if this argument is admitted, it proves, not that a fee is necessarily intended, but that these restrictions on the life estate ought to be held to be done away by the words in question. They admit of quite as natural an interpretation, by being construed to mean free of encumbrances; and, in this view, are just as applicable to a life estate as a fee. Perhaps the testator himself may have entertained the notion that the legacies in his will, or that of his father, were encumbrances on the estate; and if so, the words would indicate an intention that the wife should be disencumbered of the burthen. But in what way are we to reconcile the argument deduced from this clause, with that drawn on the same side from the preceding proviso? How could the testator intend that the wife should "freely possess and enjoy" the lands in fee, when, in one event, he had stripped her of the whole estate, and that by a condition inseparably annexed as an encumbrance to her estate? We ought not to suppose that he intended to repeal the proviso under such a general 243] phrase. The *case of Loveacres v. Blight, Cowp. Rep. 352, has been supposed to be a direct support of the argument in favor of a fee. In that case, the testator made the following devise: "As touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me in this life, I give," etc., "in the following manner and form: First of all, I give and bequeath to E. M., my dearly beloved wife, the sum of five pounds, to be paid yearly out of my estate, called G., and also one part of the dwelling-house, being the west side, with as much wood craft, home at her, as she shall have need of, by my executors hereafter named. I give," etc., "unto my son, T. M., the sum of five pounds, to be paid in twelve months after my decease. I give unto my granddaughter, E., the sum of five pounds, to be paid twelve months after my decease. Item, I give unto J. M. and R. M., my two sons, whom I make my ——— and ordain my sole executors," etc., "all and singular my lands and messuages, by them freely to be possessed and enjoyed alike." The question was, whether, by this clause, the sons took an estate for life or in fee. The court held that they took a tenancy in common in fee. Lord Mansfield, in delivering the opinion of the court, admitted that, if the intention were doubtful, the general rule of law must take place. But he laid stress upon the circumstance that the estate was charged with an annuity to his wife, so that the testator could not mean by the word "freely," to give it free of encumbrances. He thought the free enjoyment must, therefore, mean free from all *limitations, that is, the absolute prop- [*244 erty of the estate. He also thought the introductory clause not unimportant; and that the blank after "my" was intended to be filled with "heirs;" and it can scarcely escape observation that it was a case where the sons of the testator were the devisees. These considerations may well lead to a doubt whether Lord Mansfield intended to lay down any general principle of construction in relation to the words, "freely to be enjoyed," etc. But, if he did, the subsequent case of Goodright v. Barron, 11 East's Rep. 220, has manifestly interfered with its authority. In that case, there was an introductory clause, "as touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me," etc.; and the testator then proceeded as follows: "I give and bequeath to my brother T. D., a cottage house, and all belonging to it, to him, and his heirs, forever, W. C. tenant. Also, I give and bequeath to my wife E., whom I likewise make my sole executrix, all and singular my lands, messuages and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed." The court held that the wife took an estate for life only; that the words, being ambiguous, did not pass a fee against the heir, but might mean free from encumbrances or charges, free from impeachment for waste; and that the introductory clause could not be brought down into the latter distinct clause to aid it, though, if joined, it might have had that effect. The court distinguished that case from the case before Lord Mansfield, because, in the latter, as the testator had already *encumbered [*245 the estate, the words must have meant to pass a fee, or they would have no meaning at all. Mr. Justice Le Blanc added, that the words used were not inconsistent with a life estate only; and he distinguished between them and the words "freely to be disposed of," admitting that the latter would pass a fee. So that, taking both these cases together, the fair deduction is, that the words, "freely to be possessed," etc., are too uncertain, of themselves, to raise a fee, but they may be aided by other circumstances.

The case before us is far less strong than either of the foregoing cases, for there is no introductory clause showing an intention to dispose of the whole property, as there was both in Goodright v. Barron and Loveacres v. Blight; nor is there any encumbrance created by the testator on the land, which was the decisive circumstance that governed the latter.

Upon the whole, upon the most careful examination, we cannot find a sufficient warrant in the words of this will to pass a fee to the wife. The testator may have intended it, and probably did, but the intention cannot be extracted from his words with reasonable certainty; and we have no right to indulge ourselves in mere private conjectures.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

246*] [*Remission of Forfeiture. Pleading.]

THE UNITED STATES
v.
MORRIS, Marshal of the Southern District of New York.

The Secretary of the Treasury has authority, under the remission act of the 3d of March, 1797, c. 361 (LVII.), to remit a forfeiture or penalty accruing under the revenue laws, at any time, before or after a final sentence of condemnation or judgment for the penalty, until the money is actually paid over to the collector for distribution.

Such remission extends to the shares of the forfeiture or penalty to which the officers of the customs are entitled, as well as to the interest of the United States.

In a plea of justification by the marshal, for not levying an execution, setting forth a remission by the Secretary of the Treasury, of the forfeiture or penalty on which the judgment was obtained, it is not necessary to set forth the statement of facts upon which the remission was founded.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action brought against the defendant, in the court below, as marshal of the southern district of New York, for a misfeasance in neglecting to proceed on a venditioni exponas issued out of the District Court of the United States for the district of Maine, requiring him to sell the goods and chattels of Andrew Ogden, Abraham K. Smedes, and Thomas C. Butler, which he had levied upon by virtue of certain executions issued against them, in favor of the United States, on a judgment recovered in the said District Court of Maine, and which goods and chattels remained in his 247*] hands for want *of buyers, according to his return on said executions. The misconduct, or neglect of duty, alleged against the marshal, was, that he did not sell the property so levied upon, according to the command of the writ, but delivered the same up to the defendants, discharged from the execution. The declaration stated the judgment to have been recovered in the September term of the court, in the year 1817, for $22,361.75, damages, and which, in part, to wit, in the sum of $11,180.87, remained in full force, not reversed, paid off or satisfied, to the plaintiffs, and that execution to that amount remains to be done. The venditioni exponas, as was alleged, was put into the hands of the marshal on the 13th day of August, 1819.

The pleadings in the cause show that Andrew Ogden, of the city of New York, in or about the month of June, in the year 1813, imported into Portland, in the district of Maine, certain goods and merchandise in the brig Hollen, which vessel, as well as the goods, belonged to him. These goods, together with the brig, were thereupon seized as forfeited to the United States, on the ground that the goods had been imported in that vessel, in violation of the non-intercourse acts then in existence. The goods and vessel were libeled in the District Court of Maine, on the 6th of July, 1813, and on the 19th of the same month were delivered up to Andrew Ogden, after having been regularly appraised, upon his having executed, together with Abraham K. Smedes, and Thomas C. Butler, a bond for their appraised *value. The vessel [*248 and goods were afterwards, on the 27th of May, 1817, condemned as forfeited to the use of the United States. And such proceedings were thereupon had, that, in the following September term of the court, a judgment was entered upon the bond of appraisement for $22,361.75, with costs.

The defendant, Morris, pleaded the general issue, and a special plea in justification, that the forfeitures had been remitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, setting out in hæc verba, two warrants of remission, which were duly served upon him before the return day of the venditioni exponas, and averring a compliance, on the part of the defendants, with all the terms and conditions required by the warrants of remission. All which were duly set forth in the return on the venditioni exponas, before the commencement of the present suit.

To this special plea, a replication was filed, stating, in substance that at the time of the forfeiture, seizure and condemnation, of the brig Hollen, and the goods imported in her; and, also, at the time of their condemnation, and the entering up of the judgment on the bond for their appraised value, and of the issuing of the several writs of execution, and at the time of the making and issuing the said warrants of remission, and of the service thereof on the defendant, etc., Isaac Ilsley and James C. Jewett, were the collector and surveyor of the port of Portland, and, as such entitled to one-half of the said forfeiture; and that the said several executions *were issued for [*249 their benefit, and solely to collect the said sum of $11,180.87, for their own separate use, and that the defendant had notice thereof when the said several writs of execution were delivered to him to be executed; setting out, also, two indorsements on the execution, one signed by the district-attorney of Maine, notifying the defendant that the execution was for the benefit of the said collector and surveyor, and directing the marshal to collect the same by their order. The other was signed by the collector and surveyor, requiring the marshal to collect the execution forthwith, and deposit the money agreeably to the command of the writ, and notifying him that the property in the execution was in them, and directing him to receive orders from them, and from no other person whatsoever, in whatever related to the said execution. And it was then averred, that the present suit was for the purpose of enabling the collector and surveyor to recover their damages for the injury they had sustained by reason of the misfeasance of the defendant, in the declaration mentioned, and not for the benefit, use or behoof of the said plaintiffs.

To this replication the defendant demurred specially, and stated the following causes of demurrer: (1) For that the replication is a departure from the declaration, in this, that the declaration proceeds upon a cause of action in favor of the United States; whereas the replication proceeds upon a cause of action in favor of the said Ilsley and Jewett, etc. (2) For that [*250] the *replication discloses no lawful and sufficient authority for the said Ilsley and Jewett, to prosecute the said action against the said T. Morris, etc., and in the name of the United States. (3) For that the declaration proceeds upon the ground that the several writs of execution, therein respectively mentioned, were issued upon a judgment obtained for the use of the United States, and, therefore, according to the act in such case made, etc., might lawfully run and be executed in any other state or territory of the United States, than the said district of Maine, in which the said judgment was obtained. Whereas the replication discloses the fact that the said judgment was not obtained for the use of the said United States, but for the use and benefit of the said Ilsley and Jewett, and, therefore, could not run and be executed in any other state, etc. (4) That the suit is prosecuted in the name of the United States, by an attorney, on record, other than the district-attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York.

A joinder in demurrer having been filed, judgment was given for the defendant in the court below, and the cause brought by writ of error to this court.

On the part of the plaintiff in error, it was contended that the judgment ought to be reversed,

1. Because the Secretary of the Treasury had no power to remit the share of the forfeiture which belonged to the custom-house officers.

2. Because the action was rightly brought in the name of the United States, by an attorney of *the court below, specially authorized [*251 to prosecute the suit by an order of the judges of that court.

3. Because the replication is not a departure from the declaration, proceeding upon a different cause of action from that stated in the declaration.

Mr. Wheaton, for the plaintiffs in error, stated the principal question in the cause to be, whether after a definitive sentence of condemnation, in a revenue cause, the Secretary of the Treasury has a right, under the remission act of the 3d of March, 1797, c. 361 (LXVII.),[1] to remit the forfeiture so as *to affect the [*252 right of the officers of the customs, under the collection act of 1799, c. 128 (CXXVIII.), ss. 89 and 91,[2] to a moiety of the fines, penalties and forfeitures, *recovered under the act. [*253 He insisted that the right of the collector, etc., accruing by the seizure, was consummated by the final sentence of condemnation, and became an absolutely vested right, which could not be devested by the remission after such sentence. This had been expressly determined in the Circuit Court for the first circuit;[3] and though the case had not hitherto been presented to this court, there were other analogous cases which settled the doctrine, that as between the representatives of a deceased collector and his successor in office, or as between a removed collector and such successor, the share of the forfeiture to which he is entitled attaches, and is

1.—Which provides, (s. 1), "That wherever any person or persons, who shall have incurred any fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability, or shall have been interested in any vessel, goods, wares or merchandise which shall have been subject to any seizure, forfeiture or disability, by force of any present or future law of the United States, for the laying, levying or collecting any duties or taxes, or by force of any present or future act, concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels, or any act concerning the enrolling and licensing ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries, and for regulating the same, shall prefer his petition to the judge of the district in which such fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability shall have accrued, truly and particularly setting forth the circumstances of his case; first causing reasonable notice to be given to the person or persons claiming such fine, penalty or forfeiture, and to the attorney of the United States for such district, that each may have an opportunity of showing cause against the remission or mitigation thereof, and shall cause the facts which shall appear upon such inquiry to be stated and annexed to the petition, and direct their transmission to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture or penalty, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person of persons incurring the same; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem reasonable and just." (s. 3), "That nothing herein contained shall be construed to effect the right or claim of any person to that part of any fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred by the breach of any of the laws aforesaid, which such person shall or may be entitled to, by virtue of the said laws, in cases where a prosecution has been commenced, or information has been given before the passing of this act, or any other act relative to the mitigation or remission of such fines, penalties or forfeitures; the amount of which right and claim shall be assessed and valued by the proper judge or court in a summary way."

2.—Which provides, (s. 89), "That all penalties accruing by any breach of this act, shall be sued for and recovered, with costs of suit, in the name of the United States of America, in any court competent to try the same; and the trial of any fact which may be put in issue, shall be within the judicial district in which any such penalty shall have accrued; and the collector within whose district the seizure shall have been made, or forfeiture incurred is hereby enjoined to cause suits for the same to be commenced without delay, and prosecuted to effect; and is, moreover, authorized to receive from the court, within which such trial is had, or from the proper officer thereof, the sum or sums so recovered, after deducting proper charges, to be allowed by the said court; and on receipt thereof the said collector shall pay and distribute the same, without delay, according to law," etc. (S. 91) "That all fines, penalties and forfeitures, recovered by virtue of this act, and not otherwise appropriated, shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of as follows: One moiety shall be for the use of the United States, and be paid into the treasury thereof by the collector receiving the same; the other moiety shall be divided between, and paid in equal proportions to, the collector and naval officer of the district and surveyor of the port wherein the same shall have been incurred, or to such of the said officers as there may be in the said district; and in districts where only one of the aforesaid officers shall have been established, the said moiety shall be given to such officer," etc.

consummated by the sentence of condemnation.[1] This went upon the principle that it became an absolutely vested right, by relation back to the time of the seizure. If it were an absolutely vested right, it must be vested as against the government. It is not vested, even as against the government, at the time of the seizure. That only gives an inchoate right, which may never become absolute for want of a condemnation, or may be intercepted by a remission before condemnation. The forfeiture 254*] *has, for certain purposes, relation back to the commission of the offense. As between the offender and all persons claiming as purchasers of the property, and the government, the forfeiture attaches at the moment of delictum.[2] But this proceeds from the necessary strictness of all fiscal regulations, and does not prevent a remission before condemnation. The delictum does, indeed, devest the proprietary interest from the owner, so as to overreach the claims of subsequent purchasers; but it does not, therefore, follow that the share to which the officers of the customs may become entitled, vests in them eo instanti. Their title may never vest, by reason of three contingencies: (1) There may be no seizure. (2) There may be a remission after the offense, and before condemnation. (3) There may be no condemnation. If there be no seizure, of course no title vests. If there be a remission before condemnation, as no title has yet vested except against subsequent purchasers, it purges the offense entirely, by relation back to the delictum. If there be no condemnation, the inchoate title is never ripened into maturity. But if there be a remission after condemnation, the rights of the seizing officers have become absolute, and the remission purges the offense (if it has any effect at all) only so far as the government is concerned.

This would appear from the plain reading of the collection act of 1799, c. 128 (CXXVIII.); 255*] ss. *89, 90, 91, which directs the collector to prosecute for breaches of the revenue laws, and to receive the sums recovered, and to pay and distribute the same among the different persons entitled. It must be admitted, on all hands, that the right must absolutely vest at some period. The court have already rejected the notion that it does not vest until the actual receipt and payment over of the money.[3] There could, therefore, be no other epoch but that of the sentence of condemnation, which, if definitive, or unappealed from, fixes and ascertains the rights of all parties. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the government may afterwards remit, so far as its own rights are exclusively concerned, it cannot certainly be concluded, from the terms of the remission act, that the government intended to revoke its bounty, conferred absolutely upon its officers by a solemn statute for great purposes of public policy. It is immaterial what the Secretary of the Treasury intended to do. The question is, what was he authorized to do by the law under which he acted?

All the analogies of the common law would be found to repel the idea that the remission could devest the rights which had become ascertained and fixed by the sentence of condemnation. Pardon and remission are synonymous terms, and their legal effect upon the rights of parties must be the same. "Pardon" is defined to be "a work of mercy, whereby the King forgiveth any *offense, etc., right, title, [*256 debt, or duty."[4] The power which is given to the President by the constitution, of granting pardons for offenses, may, or may not, extend to revenue cases; but whether the pardon is granted by the President, or by his minister, is immaterial. It is still the act of the government, and it can have no greater effect in the one case than in the other. It is laid down that a pardon does not discharge the thing in which the subject has a property or interest; as if a suit be in the Spiritual Court for tithes, a legacy contract, or matrimony, etc.,[5] or for dilapidation.[6] So, if an incumbent accepts a plurality, the interest of the patron to present is not discharged by a general pardon.[7] A penalty, upon a conviction for deer-stealing, is not discharged by a pardon; for it is a forfeiture to the party grieved.[8] The King cannot, by his pardon, discharge an action commenced qui tam upon a penal statute, except for the King's moiety or part.[9] Nor penalties to be divided between the informer and the poor of the parish.[10] So, a pardon does not discharge a thing consequent or incident in which the subject has an interest vested in him; as costs taxed in the Spiritual Court, a pardon of the offense does not discharge the costs.[11] And this, though the party appeals after the taxation of costs, so that the sentence is suspended by the appeal.[12] So, if the party appeals *af- [*257 ter costs taxed, and then the pardon comes, and upon the appeal the former sentence is annulled, and costs given to the appellant; these costs are not discharged by the pardon; for the costs being taxed in the original suit, the party had a right of appeal, which was not taken away by the pardon; and, consequently, has a right to the costs.[13] So, on a proceeding in rem, in the Exchequer, the crown's share only of a forfeiture is pardoned, by an act of general pardon, but not the informer's on an information previously filed.[14] And in prize proceedings, the condemnation is held to vest the right in the captors so absolutely that the government cannot release. Thus, in the case of The Elsbe (one of the famous Swedish convoys), Sir W. Scott determined that the crown might interpose to release the captured vessels before, but not after, a final adjudication.[15]

As to the technical questions which had been raised by the special demurrer upon the pleadings, they were all involved in the question upon the merits. If the remission was void as to the custom-house officers, they had a right to sue in the name of the United States; or, rather, the latter are suing in their own name, to give effect to their own bounty granted to those officers, who are prosecutors from the beginning in the name of the United States. They are not only privies, but parties, and are concluded by 258*] a sentence of acquittal as well as of condemnation.[1] But they may also be considered as the assignees of the United States, and then the question whether they are to sue in their own name, or in that of the United States, will depend upon the forms of proceeding in analogous cases. By the civil law, on the cession of a debt, the assignor impliedly ceded to the assignee all his rights of action as incidental to the cession. The assignee became what was called procurator in rem suam, and sued in the name of his assignor. So, in England, and in this country, it has long since been settled that the assignee of a chose in action may sue in the name of the assignor, who has no right to interfere with the suit.[2] By the ancient common law, the King could assign a chose in action, though a subject could not. But the assignee of the King took it with all the high prerogative remedies. Thus, it is laid down that the King's grantee may sue an obligation, etc., granted to him, in his own name, or may prosecute in the King's name; "for the grant of the statute, or debt, is a warrant to him to prosecute process in the King's name."[3] Thus where a debt due to an outlawed person was granted by the King, held, that the grantee might levy it in his own name, or, by extent, in the King's name, "although he hath not 259] any words in his *grant to sue it in the name of the King, as is usual in such cases."[4]

As to the alleged departure in pleading, which is relied on as one of the causes of demurrer, the objection is, that the replication sets up a cause of action in the custom-house officers, whilst the declaration proceeds on a cause of action for the United States. The answer is, that the suit being here brought in the name of the United States, whose duty and interest it is to prosecute for the benefit of the officers (who are their grantees), notwithstanding the remission, the cause of action stated in the replication is just as much in favor of the United States as that set up in the declaration. How, then, stand the pleadings? (1) The declaration setting up a cause of action in favor of the United States. (2) A plea of remission by the United States. (3) A replication, admitting the fact of remission, and affirming the cause of action in favor of the United States, as set up in the declaration, with a new circumstance, viz., a right of third persons, which invalidates the remission so far as they are concerned. This new matter is asserted, not by the officers, but by the United States themselves, who sue precisely as if the parties had not performed the conditions on which the remission was granted, and it had become totally void. It was not necessary that this new matter should have been stated in the *declaration. [*260 In declaring, it is only necessary to set out enough to maintain the action. In an action for not executing a writ of execution, it is sufficient to set out the judgment, execution, and facts of neglect or misfeasance. Even stating the judgment is merely inducement. It is sufficient to state concisely the circumstances which give rise to the defendant's particular duty or liability.[5] The remission was a matter of defense which was incumbent on the defendants to set forth. Successive pleadings are designed for this very purpose. The office of the declaration is to set forth the cause of action merely, of the plea to avoid it, and of the replication to avoid the plea. Thus, in debt on bond for the performance of covenants, the plaintiff declared for the penalty. The defendant craved oyer, and pleaded general performance. The plaintiff replied, setting forth particular breaches, and it was held good.[6] The declaration in the present case pursues the most approved forms, and with more circumstantiality than usual.[7] Departure is where the plea contains subsequent matter, which does not maintain or fortify the matter in the declaration.[8] But here it does maintain it, and, at the same time, avoids the bar. The bar is remission; the replication shows that it is no answer to the declaration. *In Winch v. Keeley,[9] in assumpsit, de- [*261 fendant pleaded that plaintiff had become a bankrupt, and assigned all his effects, under the statute, to his legal assignees; plaintiff replied that the suit was brought by him for the use of another party, to whom he had transferred the debt before the bankruptcy. The replication was held good, and the objection of departure was not even mentioned at the bar.

On the part of the defendant, it was insisted that the judgment ought to be affirmed, for the following reasons:

1. Because the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to remit the forfeiture in question, notwithstanding the judgment of condemnation previously rendered, as stated in the pleadings.

2. Because the whole case, on the part of the collector and surveyor of Portland, proceeds on the ground that the remission by the Secretary is binding upon the United States, and discharges their moiety of the forfeiture, but has not that effect on the other moiety claimed by them; thus giving a construction to the remission, inconsistent with its own terms and the act under which it was granted. According to that act, the remission must be valid to the whole extent of the power exercised under it, or not at all; as it is admitted, therefore, to be good in part, it follows that it is good for the whole.

3. Because such a remission is not like a pardon, nor is it to be governed by the same rules; *but is equivalent to the judgment or [*262 decree of a competent tribunal, that no forfeiture should be enforced, inasmuch as it was without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud, in the person or persons incurring the same.

4. Because, as far at least as it relates to the act of Congress, vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury the remitting power, as therein mentioned, the custom-house officers have no vested rights in any forfeiture, until not only condemnation, but the receipt of the money produced by a sale of the forfeiture or collection of the bond substituted for it, before which time the Secretary has full power to remit; and, having exercised it in this case, the collector and surveyor of Portland are equally bound by it as the United States.

5. Because, if the said collector and surveyor of Portland had any vested rights in the forfeiture in question, notwithstanding the remission, then they ought to have enforced them by an action in their own name, and not in that of the United States.

6. Because the condemnation of the brig and goods being to the use of the United States, and the recovery in the bond being also in the name of the United States, they became trustees for the collector and surveyor of Portland, for whatever rights or interest they had therein; and these, whatever they were, were discharged by the remission of the Secretary, inasmuch as the release of a trustee is, at law, a 263*] *bar of the rights or interest of his cestui qui trust, and especially in a case where fraud is neither charged nor pretended.

7. Because, this being an action to recover damages for a misfeasance, if the United States themselves could sustain it, yet, it being, in its nature, incapable of assignment, they could not transfer to the said collector and surveyor such right of action, and authorize its prosecution in their name; much less can it be prosecuted without any such assignment or authority.

8. Because, if the United States could themselves sustain such an action, the said collector and surveyor would be entitled to no part of the damages recovered; for such damages would not be the forfeiture, nor the proceeds of the bond which was substituted for it; to a share of which only they are by law entitled. Of course, therefore, they cannot sustain the present action to recover damages for their own private benefit, in the name of the United States, which, if recovered by the United States, they would be entitled to no share of.

Mr. Emmett and Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the defendant, stated, upon the first point, that it was remarkable, and might be useful for interpreting the law, that the question as to the power of the Secretary to remit, after sentence, was never raised until subsequently to the judgment of this court in Jones v. Shore,[1] and more 264*] especially *until after what fell from Story, J., in The Margarita.[2] That no such doubt was conceived to exist at the bar before the case of Jones v. Shore, appears from the arguments of all the counsel in that case, which admit that the right was not so vested as not to be defeated by a remission. An expression there attributed to Mr. Pinkney,[1] as to the President's power of pardoning, leads to an examination of the distinction between this power of remission and the pardoning power. The power of pardoning is a prerogative given to the President by the constitution, analogous to that exercised by the British, and other sovereigns. It is an act of grace and mercy, founded on the fact of guilt and crime, but exercised from other considerations than those which govern a remission by the treasury. It is laid down, that "the King, by his prerogative, may grant his pardon to all offenders attainted or convicted of a crime, where he has hope of their amendment."[4] The remission proceeds on the ground of moral innocence, and is to be only a consequence of it. The Secretary of the Treasury has no power whatever, except where, in his opinion, from the judicial statements of facts, the forfeiture "shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same." A pardon being an act of grace and mercy to an acknowledged criminal, it is but just *that it should not disturb [*265 the rights of others, founded on the fact of that guilt, and their industry in detecting it; but where the remission is founded on moral innocence, the justice of the case is the other way. In this respect, there ought to be no difference whether a condemnation was had or not; for, although a sentence of condemnation may establish a violation of the letter of the revenue laws, the remission proceeds on the ground that it establishes no guilt, and the petition for the remission must admit all the facts on which conviction could be founded. The remission is intended to be, and is, in fact, a judicial decision. It is the policy of the revenue laws to make certain acts subject to forfeiture and penalties. It adopts this course, in order to relieve the government from the onus of proving that those acts were coupled with a criminal intent; and to oblige the party suffering to prove the innocence of his mind, by such evidence as would satisfy the proper officer of the government itself. In analogy to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to take cognizance of a judgment at law, and relieve against it on principles which the courts of law could not have taken into consideration, the Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to administer equitable relief, on principles which the revenue courts could not apply; but which go to the entire destruction of all guilt, and ought, therefore, to go to the entire remission of all punishment. The preliminary proceedings are all judicial, by petition to the district judge, and by examinations before him; *and, like an [*266 analogous suit in equity, all parties interested are brought before the court to assert their rights, and contest the justice of the application. The officers of the customs, having notice, and the liberty of contesting the matter, are parties to the suit or application, and can no more complain that they are deprived of vested rights than they could where a court of equity decreed a perpetual injunction on a judgment at law.

The statute, having thus provided for making all persons interested parties to the suit, uses the most general language possible to cover the entire remission of the forfeiture. The prayer of the petition extends to the remission of the whole, and the power given to the Secretary is to remit "such fines," etc. The proviso in the 3d section shows the extent to which it was intended to protect vested interests, or to consider them as vested, viz., where a prosecution had been commenced, or information given, before the passing of the act. Every information, seizure or prosecution, subsequent to the passing of the act, was followed up, subject to the provisions of that act. It formed a limitation upon the extent of vesting the interests of the prosecutors, or, to use the expression of one of the counsel, in Jones v. Shore,[1] "it is a condition originally attached by the law," and attached, whether the interest became originally vested by the seizure, the condemnation, or the recovery and receipt of 267*] the money. *To what extent is the vesting? It is decided in Van Ness v. Buel[2] that the collector acquires an inchoate right by the seizure, which, by the subsequent decree of condemnation, gives him an absolute vested title to his share in the forfeiture; and it is also determined in Jones v. Shore,[1] that the right to share in the forfeitures and penalties is given to the collector who made the seizure, and not to him in office on the receipt of the money. These adjudications were as between officers themselves, and not between an officer and the owner of the thing seized. But they establish the principle that the right made absolute by condemnation was that, and only that, which had become inchoate by seizure. That inchoate right was, under the statute, subject to be destroyed by remission according to its provisions, and therefore that made absolute must be subject to the same provisions.

But the vesting of the right, as laid down in the case of The Margarita[3] does not take place before a final judgment or sentence; and the same epoch is assigned in the case of The Elsebe,[4] for the vesting of prize interests in cases of capture. Now, prize courts can take notice of all equitable considerations, but a revenue court cannot. Notwithstanding condemnation, then, it remains to be inquired, whether there was any criminal intent. If innocence be alleged, and the proper proceedings founded on 268*] it to be institute, *until those proceedings are decided upon, there is no final adjudication, within the spirit and meaning of the act.

Another consideration shows that the remission must operate to extinguish the rights of the officers of the customs. They could maintain no action for the forfeiture as in their own names. The forfeiting party has nothing to do with them; he forfeits only to the United States, and it is only as between the United States and the officers that the latter have any claim. In this respect there is a material difference between our act and the British revenue laws. By the British statute, one-half is forfeited to the use of the crown, and the other to the use of the informer. In the Exchequer, the form of proceeding is to adjudge a moiety of the forfeiture to the seizors, or informer, by the sentence itself, and it becomes a vested right in them, by relation back to the filing of the information.[5] But in this country, the utmost that can be said is, that the United States are, pro tanto, trustees for them; but as to the forfeiting party, the government is the only legal actor. There must be a right of releasing somewhere. A release by the officers of the customs would not prevent the United States from recovering the whole penalty. Thus, in debt on a single bond made to A, to the use of him and B, the defendant pleaded a release made to him by B; on which the plaintiff demurred; and without difficulty, it was adjudged *for the [*269 plaintiff; for B is no party to the deed, and therefore can neither sue nor release it. But it is an equitable trust for him, and suable in the chancery, if A will not let him have part of the money; and the book of Edw. III., cited, that he might release in such case, was denied to be law.[6] Since there must be a power of releasing somewhere, and the officers could not do it, the power must reside in the United States, and the remission is such a release.[7]

Cases have been cited on the other side, in which courts of law have taken notice of equitable interests, and have permitted them to be pleaded or replied, so as to protect them. All these cases proceed on the ground of fraud and collusion, which cannot be charged here. As to Bottomley v. Brook, and Rudge v. Birch,[8] they are said by Mr. Maryatt, in Schooley v. Mears,[9] to have been overruled in the Exchequer, in the case of Lane v. Chandler; and in Wake v. Tinkler, Lord Ellenborough says: "I am much more inclined to restrain than to extend the doctrine of these cases." And Bailey, J., says, "we have nothing to do in this case with any other than legal rights." So in Bakerman v. Radenius,[10] Mr. Erskine (arguendo) states a case before Lord Mansfield, where an action was brought in the name of a nominal plaintiff by persons beneficially *inter-[*270 ested, for whom he was a trustee. At the trial, the defendant produced a release from the plaintiff, which Lord Mansfield held to be conclusive; but said the Court of Chancery, upon application, would make the trustee pay the principal, the debt, if well founded, and the costs of suit. And Lawrence, J., cites a case from Salkeld,[11] where Lord Holt said that if the plaintiff in ejectment, who is considered only as a trustee for the lessor, released the action, he might be committed for a contempt of the court; "but he did not say the release would not defeat the action." So, in Paine v. Rogers,[12] where the tenant, a nominal plaintiff, having given a release to the plaintiff, the court, on application of the landlord, ordered it to be given up; clearly, because if used it would defeat the action. And in Legh v. Legh, the obligor of a bond, after notice of its being assigned, took a release from the obligee, and pleaded it to an action brought by the assignee, in the name of the obligee. The court, on motion, set the plea aside, Eyre, C. J., saying, "the only question is, whether the assignee must not seek relief in a court of equity." Clearly showing, as the whole case does, that the plea could not be replied to at law.

But why should the custom-house officers be entitled to maintain this action in the name of the United States, notwithstanding their release, and having no possible interest in the re- 271*] sult? *Why should they have the benefit of not being liable to costs for a false action? They are not assignees of the United States, if that would protect them. There can be no assignment of a test. The injury by the marshal's return is directly to themselves, and the United States have barred themselves from regarding it as an injury to them by the remission. The right to sue in the name of another only existed where the action would not lie in the name of the party actually interested. But, in every case where the unlawful act of one person does an injury to another, an action on the case lies for the injury. Can the United States, who are not injured, sustain this action? If they could, is such a right of action assignable? Here, however, is no actual assignment; and it can only be considered as analagous to the consignment of a chose in action. But how can the real plaintiffs entitle themselves to the damages recovered in the name of the United States, without such assignment? The law only gives them half the forfeiture or proceeds. How, then, can they, notwithstanding the release or remission by the United States, recover, in their name, damages which they are not legally entitled to participate in? and do so for their own benefit, when, if they have sustained damages, they may sue in their own name?

And this brings us to consider some of the special causes of demurrer. The replication is a departure from the declaration, not only by not bringing forward matter pursuant to it, and fortifying it, but by bringing forward 272*] matter showing *no right of action in the plaintiffs, and showing, that if it exists anywhere, it exists in third persons; and that this matter was known, and might be made available, before action brought. Departure is defined to be, "when the second plea containeth matter not pursuant to his former, and which fortifieth not the same, and, therefore, it is called decessus, because he departeth from his former plea."[1] Thus, where the defendant pleads in bar a lease for fifty years made by a corporation, plaintiff replies that it was made while a former lease was in existence, and shows the statute 21 Hen. VIII., and that the lease for fifty years was void; not setting forth the proviso making such leases good for twenty-one years. Defendant, in his rejoinder, pleads the proviso of the statute 21 Hen. VIII., which makes such leases good for twenty-one years. Held, that this pleading of the proviso was a departure, because it neither goes with, nor enforces the bar before.[2] So, in a præcipe quod reddat, the tenant pleads that the land was devised to him, and the plaintiff replies that the devisor was an infant. To this the defendant says that, by the custom, infants may devise; and, per Curiam, this is a departure, for he ought to have pleaded the special matter first.[3] So, in Doctr. Plac. 124, per Keble, nota, where general matter is pleaded, and where the special matter might have been *pleaded at the commencement, [*273 the party, afterwards, shall not maintain the general matter with the special matters. And if the defendant justifies by distress for rent, and the plaintiff replies that he used and sold them, to which the defendant rejoins that he sold the distress pursuant to the statute 2 W. & M., it will be a departure; for it should have been alleged so at first.[4] Defendant, in a plea, justified taking cattle damage feasant, and afterwards rejoined that they were taken surcharging the common; held to be a departure; and one of the reasons was, that the surcharge might have been pleaded first, because the defendant then knew the plaintiff's right.[5] So, when a man, in his former plea, pleadeth an estate made by the common law, in the second plea, regularly, he shall not make it good by an act of Parliament. So, when, in his former plea, he entitleth himself, generally, by the common law, in his second plea he shall not enable himself by a custom, but should have pleaded it at first.[6]

As to the third clause of demurrer, the statute only enables the issuing of a writ of execution to another district, upon judgments "obtained for the use of the United States." The present judgment was obtained in their name, but for the use of other parties. It is contended that if the judgment was for the use of the United States, the execution need not be so. But the privilege *obviously at- [*274 taches to the execution, and not to the judgment. It was for the benefit of the government, and was not intended to be communicable to citizens in cases where the United States have no interest. All the rules for construing statutes will bear out this interpretation.[7]

Mr. Webster, for the plaintiffs, in reply, insisted that the authority to sue in the name of the United States could not be disputed by the defendant in this court. The government was here represented by the Attorney-General, and if he did not interfere with the suit, it might well be maintained. It was novel doctrine that an appearance by a wrong attorney was a ground of demurrer. If it had been intended to take advantage of that objection, a summary application should have been made to the court below, by whom the attorney on the record had been appointed to prosecute this suit, the district-attorney having refused to prosecute it. The discretionary power exercised by the court below in this instance, was essential to the administration of justice, whenever the district-attorney refuses to act, or is interested, or in case of his death. But, even if this court should be of opinion that the order made in the present case was irregular, it would not, on that account, give judgment against the sufficiency of the plaintiff's replication as pleaded. It would merely direct the pleadings to be amended by inserting the name 275*] *of the district-attorney in the place of the present attorney on the record. The plaintiff's declaration is admitted to be good, and it is unnecessary to consider the replication, since the plea contains the first fault (if any) in the pleadings. It cannot be pretended that it is a good plea, because the plaintiff has declared by a wrong attorney. If this judgment be affirmed, it is a perpetual bar as against the United States, and all others interested. While the cause is allowed to stand on the calendar, the rights of the parties, as stated in the pleadings, must alone be regarded. But the officers of the customs have a right to use the name of the United States. The cases cited in the opening sufficiently show it. Wherever the subject has an interest in a prosecution in which the King's name is necessary as a formal party, the subject has a legal right to use it. All cases of information, not ex officio, are of this sort, such as those by the Master of the Crown Office, in quo warranto, of intrusion to office, etc. The prerogative of the supreme magistrate is held, not for purposes of ostentation, but for the substantial benefit of society, and its aid may be invoked as often as necessity requires it.

The plea is bad, because the marshal, who is a mere ministerial officer, was not a competent judge of the validity or effect of the remission. He is the officer of the court, and not of the treasury. He is to collect the money, and bring it into court. When it is received in the registry, distribution is to be made of it ac- 276*] cording to *law; or if the forfeiture has been remitted, the conditions of the remission are to be complied with under the directions of the court. If the marshal had levied the money upon the execution, and no remission had been obtained, he could only be compelled to pay it over by a motion to compel him to return the process. If the remission had been unconditional, and could devest the share of the custom-house officers, he had nothing to do with carrying it into effect. It is by the court only that the rights of the parties are to be ascertained, and their respective claims to be satisfied.

The plea is also bad, because it does not set forth, with proper averments, the facts and circumstances stated in the petition to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the remission of the forfeiture was granted. It is an inflexible rule of pleading, that whenever a justification is set up under a special or limited authority, everything should be set forth to show the case to be within the protection of the authority relied on. The statement of facts on which the remission was grounded, is essential to be known, in order to see whether the Secretary of the Treasury, who also acts merely as a ministerial officer, has pursued his authority. It has, indeed, been argued that the Secretary acts judicially in those cases, and that his decision is an adjudication binding on all the world, and especially on the officers of the customs, who are both parties and privies. But how can that be a judicial power which is merely of executive discretion? 277*] The *Secretary may remit under the statute, whenever it is proved to his satisfaction that the offense was committed "without wilful negligence, or an intention of fraud;" but he is not bound to remit even in case of innocence ever so clearly proved. All judicial power, under the constitution, is vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior tribunals as Congress shall establish. How, then, can any portion of that power be vested in the treasury department, or in any other executive department?

The plea is bad, because it alleges the remission after a final sentence of condemnation, and a summary judgment upon the appraisement bond. The remission act of Congress was evidently copied from the British statute of the 27th Geo. III., c. 27; and under that statute the Commissioners of the Customs have never exercised the power of remitting a forfeiture after judgment.[1] This defect of authority having been found, in some respects, inconvenient, the power of remitting after judgment was expressly given (not to the Commissioners of the Customs, but to a higher authority) the Lords of the Treasury, by the 54th of Geo. III., c. 171. When it is said that the rights of the custom-house officers are vested from the time of the judgment or sentence, it is not meant that they are vested independent of the act of Congress, but under the act, and according to the act. If the law authorizes a remission after judgment, it is idle to speak of *rights being vested by [*278 the judgment. The question is, what does the act mean? And it is contended that it limits the power to cases before condemnation. Every clause and phrase of the act is applicable, and alone applicable, to such cases. The persons entitled to the benefit of the act, are those who "shall have incurred any fine, forfeiture or disability, or shall have been interested in any vessel, goods, wares or merchandise which shall have been subject to any seizure, forfeiture or disability," etc. This cannot refer to things already forfeited. Goods forfeited and condemned are not subject to forfeiture; they are actually forfeited. So the words, "incurred any forfeiture." No man incurs a forfeiture by a judgment against him. It is the offense by which the forfeiture is incurred. So, also, the summary inquiry which is to be made by the district judge, into the facts and circumstances of the case, shows that the law supposes that no trial had yet been had. It would be an absurd provision, upon any other supposition. The act authorizes the Secretary to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery of the forfeiture, to cease, and be discontinued. It supposes a prosecution either pending, or not yet brought. The prosecution cannot be said to be pending, in a general sense, after judgment. There is not a single expression in the act applicable to a judgment. But here are two successive judgments, one against the goods, and the other against the claimants, upon the appraisement bond. How can the remission discharge *this second judg- [*279 ment? Why was not the remission shown when the application was made for that judgment, so as to prevent its being entered? There is nothing in the act to authorize the remission of a judgment. The subjects to be remitted are, "fines, penalties, forfeitures and disabilities." Besides, the phraseology applicable to judgments would be, released or vacated; not remitted or mitigated. There must be some limit in point of time, and in the order of the proceedings, to the exercise of this power of remission. If the rights of all parties are not fixed and ascertained by the judgment, it will be difficult to discover when they are consummated. The receipt of the money by the officers may change the possession, but it cannot alter the right. That idea is expressly rejected by the court in Jones v. Shore.[1]

The argument on the other side, that there must be a power of releasing somewhere, and since the custom-house officers cannot do it, the power must reside in the United States, and may, therefore, be exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, is founded upon an entire misapprehension of the distinct powers of the different branches of the government. There is no authority given by law to any department or officer of the executive government to release a debt due by judgment. The Secretary of the Treasury may remit a forfeiture or penalty before judgment, or may 280*] discharge the debtor as to his *person, but nothing short of the legislative power of Congress, specially exercised, can discharge the debt. The usual course of the Treasury has been to refuse to remit after judgment, and to refer to the President for the exercise of the pardoning power. It may well be doubted whether that power extends, under the constitution, to cases arising under the revenue laws. But the practice shows the sense entertained by the Treasury of the limitation to its authority. Whether the President's pardoning power extends to such cases or not, there is a close analogy between a pardon and a remission; and there is no more reason why one should affect private rights and interests actually vested more than the other. Both suppose legal guilt, and some consideration which makes it consistent with the public good that it should be forgiven. A pardon, as well as a remission, often supposes moral innocence.

As to the execution running out of the district of Maine, not only was the judgment "for the use of the United States," but the execution was for their use. If the forfeiture could not be remitted after judgment, the whole debt is still due, and the United States have a direct interest in a moiety of it. If the forfeiture might be remitted, so far as the share of the United States is concerned, they have still an interest in enforcing the demand, since it is intended to secure to their officers a part of their legal compensation. But this question cannot arise upon the pleadings. The defend- 281*] ant admits that he has *executed the process, so far as the remission did not prohibit it, and he is therefore estopped by his plea from insisting that it is a void process.

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The judgment of this court being placed upon the validity of the plea, and the merits of the defense therein set up, it is unnecessary particularly to notice any other questions that have been discussed at the bar. To guard, however, against an inference, not intended by the court to be admitted, that the execution, in this case, was properly issued from the District Court of Maine to the marshal of New York, it is proper to observe that this must depend on the construction to be given to the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1797, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the receivers of public money." Independent of this act, it has not, and certainly cannot be pretended, that an execution from the District Court of Maine could run into any other state. The sixth section of that act declares, "that all writs of execution upon any judgments obtained for the use of the United States, in any of the courts of the United States, in one state, may run and be executed in any other state, but shall be issued from, and made returnable to, the court where the judgment was obtained. The pleadings in this case show conclusively, that although the *judgment is nominally in [*282 favor of the United States, yet it is substantially and beneficially for the use of the custom-house officers of Portland; and that the execution was issued solely and exclusively for their benefit, and not for the use of the United States. If it was necessary to decide this point, it might be difficult to maintain that this case came within the true intent and meaning of the act; but as the decision of the cause is put upon a point more extensive in its practical application, this is passed by without the expression of any opinion upon it. Nor is it deemed necessary to notice any objections taken to the replication. The argument has been confined principally to the plea, as being the first error on the record.

The plaintiff having replied, without taking any exceptions to the plea, he cannot now avail himself of any defect, that would not have been fatal on a general demurrer.

The objections to the plea may be considered under the following heads:

1. That it does not set forth, with proper averments, the facts and circumstances stated in the petition to the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon which the remission of the forfeiture was granted.

2. That the Secretary of the Treasury had no power to remit after condemnation.

The first objection supposes the case to fall within the rule that where a justification is set up under a special or limited authority, everything should be set out to show the case to be *within the jurisdiction of the author- [*283 ity whose protection is claimed and relied upon.

It may be observed, preliminarily, that this objection, coming so late, and at this stage of the cause, is not entitled to much indulgence. If well founded, and it had been made at an earlier day, the plea could have been amended, and much expense and litigation prevented. Every reasonable intendment, therefore, in favor of the plea, ought now to be made.

It by no means follows that, in order to sustain this plea, it is necessary to show that it would have been held good on general demurrer. For it is a rule, founded in good sense, and supported by the settled doctrines of pleading that many defects are waived and cured, by pleading over, that might have been fatal on demurrer.

But it is far from being admitted that this plea would not have stood the test of a general demurrer. The defendant was a ministerial officer, and placed in a situation in which he was obliged to judge and determine, whether to obey the command of the execution, or that of the warrant of remission from the Secretary of the Treasury. The latter is set out in hæc verba in the plea, and upon its face refers to the law under which it was issued, which was a public act; and in which warrant the Secretary of the Treasury sets forth, that a statement of facts, with the petition of Andrew Ogden, touching the forfeiture, had been transmitted to him by the district judge of the district of Maine, pursuant to the statute of the Unit-284*] ed States, entitled, "An *act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," as by the said statement of facts, and petitions remaining in the treasury department of the United States may fully appear; and that he having maturely considered said statement of facts, it appeared to his satisfaction that the said forfeitures were incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud, and thereupon remitted all the right, claim and demand of the United States, and of all others whomsoever, upon certain conditions therein specified. This warrant, therefore, upon its face, contained everything required by the law, and which was necessary to bring the case within the cognizance of the Secretary of the Treasury; and to require anything more from a ministerial officer for his justification, would be imposing upon him great hardship.

This plea, by setting out the warrant at large, adopts and asserts all the facts therein set forth, and must be taken as alleging that a statement of facts had been made by the proper officer, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and is, therefore, an averment of that fact. It is not, to be sure, a formal, but is a substantial, averment; which is nothing more than a positive statement of facts, in opposition to argument or inference.

It would be altogether useless, and mere surplusage, to set forth such statement of facts in the plea; they would not be traversable. It is not competent for any other tribunal, collaterally, to call in question the competency of the 285*] evidence, *or its sufficiency, to procure the remission. The Secretary of the Treasury is, by the law, made the exclusive judge of these facts, and there is no appeal from his decision. The law declares, that on receiving such statement, he shall have power to mitigate, or remit, such fine, forfeiture or penalty, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud, in the person or persons incurring the same. The facts are submitted to the Secretary, for the sole purpose of enabling him to form an opinion, whether there was wilful negligence, or intentional fraud, in the transaction; and the correctness of his conclusion therefrom no one can question. It is a subject submitted to his sound discretion. It would be a singular issue to present to a jury for trial, whether the facts contained in such statement were sufficient or not to satisfy the Secretary of the Treasury that there was no wilful negligence or intentional fraud. If the plea, by setting out the warrant at large, contains, as I have endeavored to show, an averment that a statement of facts had been transmitted to the Secretary by the proper officer, as required by the law, it was all that was necessary. This gave the Secretary cognizance of the case, and which was sufficient to give him jurisdiction. But what effect that statement of facts would, or ought to have, upon his opinion, whether the forfeiture was incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud, is a matter that could not be inquired into.

But, should any doubt remain on this point, it *is removed by the admissions in the [*286 replication; which begins by saying, that although true it is that the said William H. Crawford, as such Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, did make and issue the said warrants of remission, as in the said plea of the said defendant is alleged, yet, etc., proceeding to set out facts and circumstances, to show that the legal effect and operation of such remission cannot take away the moiety of the custom-house officers, but affirming its validity as to the moiety of the United States, and thereby admitting the authority and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and placing the avoidance of the operation of the remission on the rights of the custom-house officers, on a totally distinct ground. The only purpose for which the statement of facts upon which the Secretary acted, could be required to be set out in the plea, would be to show his jurisdiction; and if the replication admits this, it must certainly work a cure, or waiver of the defect. It is laid down by Chitty (Chitty on Plead., 547), and for which he cites adjudged cases which support him, that, as a defective declaration may be aided at common law by the plea, so a defective plea may be aided, in some cases, by the replication. As if, in debt on bond, to make an estate to A, the defendant pleads that he enfeoffed another to the use of A (which is not sufficient, without showing that A was a party, or had the deed), yet, if the plaintiff reply that he did not enfeoff, this aids the bar. So, if the defendant plead an award without sufficient *certainty, and[*287 the plaintiff makes a replication which imports the award to have been made, it aids the uncertainty of the bar. And this rule is not confined to matters of form merely, but extends to matters of substance. Thus, in an action of trespass for taking goods, not stating them to be the property of the plaintiff; this defect will be aided, if the defendant, by his plea, admits the plaintiff's property. So, where several acts are to be performed by the plaintiff, as a condition precedent, and he does not aver performance of all, if it appear by the plea that the act omitted to be stated was, in fact, performed, the defect is cured. 6 Binney, 24; Chitty, 402. We may, then conclude that the plea is not, in the present stage of the cause, to be deemed defective on account of the first exception taken to it.

And the remaining, and more important inquiry is, whether the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to remit the share of the forfeiture claimed by the custom-house officers. And this must depend on the construction to be given to the act under which the power was exercised. The authority of the Secretary to remit, at any time before condemnation of the property seized, is not denied on the part of the plaintiff; and it cannot be maintained that Congress has not the power to vest in this officer authority to remit after condemnation; and the only inquiry would seem to be, whether this has been done by the act referred to. 2 L. U. S. 585. The present case 288*] ought not, perhaps, to be considered *altogether as a remission after condemnation For it appears, by the warrant of remission, that the statement of facts, by the district judge, upon which the remission is founded, bears date on the 13th of June, 1814, and the condemnation did not take place until May, 1817; and although the remission was not actually granted until January, 1819, yet, as the facts on which it was founded were judicially ascertained three years before the condemnation, there would be some plausibility in maintaining that the remission should relate back to the time when the application was made to the Secretary. But we think a broader ground may be taken, and that the authority to remit is limited only by the payment of the money to the collector for distribution.

It may safely be affirmed that the question now presented has never received any judicial decision in this court. Nor has any case been cited at the bar, or recollected by the court to have been decided here, containing any principle at variance with the construction of the act now adopted.

In the case of Jones v. Shore's Executors, 1 Wheat. Rep., 462, no such question was involved. The United States there asserted no claim. Nor had the Secretary of the Treasury exercised any authority under the act in question. The money was in court for distribution, and the sole question before this court was, whether the then collector and surveyor were the actual incumbents in office, or the representatives of the late collector and surveyor, in 289*] right of their testator, *and intestate, were entitled to the money, and it was decided in favor of the latter. The same principle governed the case of Van Ness v. Buel, 4 Wheat. Rep., 75. But these cases decide no more than that the right of the custom-house officers to forfeitures, in rem, attaches on seizure, and to personal penalties on suits brought; and in each case this right is ascertained and consummated by the judgment, as between such officers and the party who has incurred the forfeiture or penalty. But they decide nothing with respect to the right, or the control of the United States, over such penalties and forfeitures. The rights and interests of these officers must necessarily be held subordinate to the authority of the United States over the subject. And that such is the light in which they are viewed, is evident from what fell from the court in the case of Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. Rep. 319. It is there said, the seizing officer is the agent of the government from the moment of the seizure up to the termination of the suit. His own will is bound up in the acts of the government in reference to the suit. By the very act of seizure, he agrees to become a party to the suit under the government; for in no other manner can he show an authority to make the seizure, or to enforce the forfeiture. If the government refuse to adopt his acts, or waive the forfeiture, there is an end to his claim; he cannot proceed to enforce that which the government repudiates.

It is not denied but that the custom-house officers have an inchoate interest upon the seizure, *and it is admitted that this [*290 may be defeated by a remission at any time before condemnation. But, if this is not the limitation put upon the authority to remit, by the act giving the power, it is difficult to discover any solid ground upon which such limitation can be assumed. If the interest of the custom-house officers, before condemnation, is conditional, and subject to the power of remission, the judgment of condemnation can have no other effect than to fix and determine that interest as against the claimant. Those officers, although they may be considered parties in interest, are not parties on the record; and it cannot with propriety be said they have a vested right, in the sense in which the law considers such rights. Their interest still continues conditional, and the condemnation only ascertains and determines the fact on which the right is consummated, should no remission take place. This is evidently the scope and policy of the laws on this subject. The forfeiture is to the United States, and must be sued for in the name of the United States. 3 L. U. S., 221, s. 89. It is made the duty of the collector to prosecute, and he is authorized to receive the money, and on receipt thereof, is required to distribute the same according to law. In all this, however, he acts as the agent of the government, and subject to the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, who may direct the prosecution to cease. And the act creating the right of the custom-house officers to a portion of the forfeiture, does not *vest any absolute right in them[291 until the money is received. (S. 91.) It declares that all fines, penalties and forfeitures, recovered by virtue of this act, shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be paid, one moiety into the treasury, and the other moiety divided between the collector, naval officer, and surveyor. No part of the act warrants the conclusion that the right of these officers becomes absolute by the condemnation. But, on the contrary, the plain and obvious interpretation is, that the right does not become fixed until the receipt of the money by the collector. Unless, therefore, the act under which the remission is allowed (2 L. U. S., 585) limits the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to the time of condemnation, the custom-house officers have no right to question the remission. That the act does not, in terms, so limit the power, is very certain; nor is such a construction warranted by the general object and policy of the law, which is intended to provide equitable relief where the forfeiture has been incurred without wilful negligence or intentional fraud. It presupposes that the offense has been committed, and the forfeiture attached according to the letter of the law, and affords relief for inadvertencies, and unintentional error. And why should such relief be foreclosed by the condemnation? The law was made for the benefit of those who had innocently incurred the penalty, and not for the benefit of the custom-house officers. If any prosecution has been instituted, the Secretary 292] has authority to direct it to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem reasonable and just. This enables him to do ample justice to the custom-house officers, not only by re-imbursing all costs and expenses incurred, but rewarding them for their vigilance, and encouraging them in the active and diligent discharge of their duty in the execution of the revenue laws. But, to consider their right to a moiety of the forfeiture as absolute, and beyond the reach of the law, after condemnation, would be subjecting the innocent to great and inequitable losses, contrary to the manifest spirit and intention of the law. The Secretary is authorized to direct the prosecution to cease and be discontinued. This, undoubtedly, gives him a control over the execution. The suit, or prosecution, does not end with the judgment, but embraces the execution, and it has so been considered by this court at the present term. And that such is the sense in which the term "prosecution" is used in these laws, is evident from the 89th section of the collection act, where the collector is required to cause suits to be commenced and prosecuted to effect. But the prosecution would be to very little effect unless it extended to and included the execution. The provision in the third section of the act under which the remission is allowed, affords a very strong inference that the rights of the custom-house officers are conditional, and subordinate to the authority to remit. It declares that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the right or claim of any per- 293] son to that part of any *fine, penalty or forfeiture, to which he may be entitled, when a prosecution has been commenced, or information has been given, before the passing of this act, or any other act relative to the mitigation or remission of such fines, penalties or forfeitures; thereby clearly showing that before such power to remit was given, the right of the custom-house officers attached upon the commencement of the prosecution, and could not be devested; but that such right was now modified, and made conditional. This provision is contained in the first law which passed in the year 1790 (2 L. U. S., 103), giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to remit penalties and forfeitures. This act was temporary, but continued from time to time until the 8th of May, 1795, when it expired, and was not revived until March, 1797, leaving a period of two years, when the power to remit was not vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, and to which period the provision in the third section of the act of 1797 probably refers.

The powers of the Secretary of the Treasury have been supposed analogous to those of the Commissioners of the Customs in England, under the statute 27 Geo. III., c. 32, s. 15. But it is very obvious, on reference to that statute, that the authority of the Commissioners to remit was limited to the condemnation. These powers were afterwards, by statute 51 Geo. III., c. 96, extended, but still limited to remissions before condemnation. It was probably not deemed advisable to confer more enlarged powers *upon the Commissioners of [*294 Customs, but that a power somewhere to remit after judgment of condemnation was proper and necessary; and, accordingly, by statute 54 Geo. III., c. 171, this power is transferred to the Commissioners of the Treasury. The two former acts are recited, and the recital then proceeds thus: "Whereas, it is expedient that the provisions of the said acts should be further extended, and that the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury should be empowered to restore, remit or mitigate any forfeiture or penalty incurred under any laws relating to the revenue, or customs, or excise, or navigation, or trade, either before or after the same shall have been adjudged in any court of law, or by or before any commissioner of excise, or justice of the peace;" and it is then enacted, that the Commissioners of the Treasury may order any goods seized as forfeited, to be restored, on the terms and conditions mentioned in the order, and may mitigate or remit any penalty or forfeiture which shall have been incurred under the revenue laws, and upon such terms and conditions as to costs, or otherwise, as under the circumstances of the case shall appear reasonable. The enacting clause in this statute is general, like our act. It does not, in terms, give the power to the Commissioners of the Treasury to remit after condemnation, and yet there can be no doubt the power extends to such cases; and, if this be so, what becomes of the rights of informers, which have been supposed to become, by the judgment of condemnation, *so vested, as not to be de- [*295 vested even by a pardon?

The powers given by this statute to the Commissioners of the Treasury, are very analogous to those given by our act to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the phraseology employed to confer such powers is nearly the same in both. Neither the one nor the other, in terms, extends the power to remission after condemnation; and there can be no reason why the same construction should not be given to both. No vested rights of informers, or custom-house officers, are violated in either case. These rights are conditional, and subordinate to the power of remission, and to be provided for in the terms and conditions upon which the remission is granted.

The practical construction given at the treasury department to our act has not been particularly inquired into. It is understood, however, that until within a few years, remissions were granted as well after as before condemnation, but that latterly this power is not exercised after condemnation, nor will the remission be granted before condemnation, unless the petitioner will admit the forfeiture has been incurred. This practice is probably founded on the impression that the equitable powers of the Secretary ought not to be interposed until the legal guilt of the petitioner is ascertained. But the rights of the custom-house officers would seem to be as much affected under such a practice, as to remit after condemnation. Those rights are said to be inchoate by the 296*] seizure, and to be consummated *by the condemnation. The confession of the forfeiture before condemnation, remaining on the record of the treasury department, although not a judicial condemnation, might well be said to consummate the rights of the custom-house officers, if they are to be considered as becoming absolute when the forfeiture is ascertained. The condemnation does no more than to determine that question, so far as respects the rights of those officers; for the condemnation is not to them, but to the United States; they are no parties to the judgment; and their rights must depend upon, and be governed and controlled by, the acts of Congress, which create and regulate such rights; and by these acts, those rights, in the opinion of the court, do not become fixed and absolute by the condemnation, but are subject to the power of remission by the Secretary of the Treasury until the money arising from the forfeiture is received by the collector for distribution. The warrant of remission, therefore, in this case, when served upon the marshal, operated as a supersedeas to the execution, and justified a discharge and restoration of the property levied upon, and exonerates him from all claim to damages by the custom-house officers.

Mr. Justice Johnson. I entirely concur with my brethren in the opinion that the power of the Secretary to remit extends as well to cases after as before judgment rendered. The question is one which I have had to consider repeatedly in my circuit, and which I so decided 297*] more than *twelve years ago. The reasons on which I then founded, and still adhere to this opinion, were briefly these:

I consider the contrary doctrine as neither consistent with the words nor the spirit of the act of 1797. The unavoidable consequence of it would be, that the suitor for grace is shut out of every legal defense; and it would be difficult to assign a reason why justice should be refused by the hand that tenders mercy. Many defenses are not only consistent with the claim for remission, but furnish in themselves the best ground for extending the benefit of the act to the party defendant. He who supposes his case not to come within the construction of a law, or that the law is repealed, expired, or unconstitutional, cannot be visited with moral offense, either in the act charged or the defense of it. Yet, how is the question of right ever to be decided, unless he is permitted to try the question before a court of law? In such a case, pertinacious adherence to his offense cannot be imputed to him, since resisting the suit on the one hand, while he sues for remission on the other, amount to no more than this, that he denies having violated the law; but if the court thinks otherwise, he then petitions for grace, on the ground of unaffected mistake; a point on which, of course, he must satisfy the Secretary, before he can obtain a remission.

If the question be tested by the letter of the law, it will be found, I think, to lead to the same conclusion. The words are, "whenever 298*] any *person, who shall have incurred any fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability, or shall have been interested in any vessel, goods, wares or merchandise which shall have been subject to any seizure, forfeiture or disability, by force of any present or future law of the United States, for laying or collecting any duties or taxes, or by force of any present or future act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels, etc., shall prefer his petition to the judge of the district in which such fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability shall have accrued, truly and particularly setting forth," etc., then, etc., the power of remission may be exercised by the Secretary, and the prosecution, if any, ordered to be staid.

On perusing this act, it must be conceded that the terms are sufficiently general to extend the powers of the Secretary, without limit, to the cases of fine, forfeiture or disability occurring under the several laws specified. The limitation, therefore, must be sought for either in some principal of construction, or in some principle aliunde, which is competent to impose such limitation.

But, with a view to construction, there will be found several considerations calculated to extend the power granted to cases wherein judgments have been obtained, rather than to restrain it to any pre-existing state of things. If the question be tested by the technical signification of the terms, in strictness the power would be confined to cases in which judgment had been obtained, rather than to those of a contrary description. *Fines, penalties [*299 and disabilities are not incurred, and do not accrue, in the technical sense of the terms, until judgment. With regard to disabilities particularly (and there is no discrimination made between the cases), I would notice that disqualification to hold any office under the United States, which is imposed upon a smuggler for seven years. Who can question that it must be counted from the day of judgment, and not from the day of the offense or information? Or who can suppose that it could be made a plea to the authority of a public officer at any time before conviction?

But, with regard to fines and forfeitures, also, there are various provisions of the United States laws which look positively to a trial as necessary to determining whether such fines and forfeitures have been incurred. I would notice particularly the 29th section of the collection law of 1799, under which, incurring the penalty for the offense there stated, is made to depend upon the master's not being able to satisfy the court, by his own oath, or other sufficient testimony, of certain facts, which, in the given case, prevent his incurring the fine.

So, also, of the 67th section of the same law, in which a forfeiture is made to accrue upon a state of facts which positively requires the intervention of a court of justice, and which, of consequence, cannot be said to have been incurred or accrued until judgment.

But other considerations present themselves upon this law, which lead to the same conclusion. *The words are, "shall prefer [*300 his petition to the judge of the district in which such fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability shall have accrued." That this word "accrued" meant something more than the term "incurred," used in the previous part of the section, is obvious from this consideration, that an offense might be committed in one district, and the offender prosecuted in another; but it never was imagined that the suit for remission could be going on in the district where the penalty was incurred, in one sense of the term, and the prosecution in another. The term "accrued," therefore, has been universally held to be here used with relation to the seizure, information, or suit for the penalty; and so far from its being held to have any effect in confining the time of prosecuting this claim for remission to the interval between information and judgment, that, practically, we know, in some of the most commercial districts, the construction adopted was, that the penalty did not accrue until conviction; and hence, suffering a decree or judgment to pass, was considered as essential to making up the case in which the suit for remission might be preferred. And there was some reason for this practice, since the necessary meaning of the term, as distinguished from the word "incurred," shows that there could hardly ever occur a case in which the suit for remission was not preceded by the suit for the penalty. But, if the defendant was compelled to confess that he had violated the law, and so the act requires, what reason could exist why judg- [*301 ment should not forthwith *pass against him? And if, under such circumstances, the judgment was a bar to the remission, the boon held out to them was all a fallacy; nay, more, it was a lure to ensnare him; for the law imposes no obligation on the judge to stay proceedings; and whether he would or not, rested with him, or with the district-attorney, until the Secretary should have time to act upon the application for remission.

The replication, however, exhibits the true ground on which the real plaintiff in this suit is compelled to rest his case; which is, that by virtue of the judgment, certain rights were vested in him, over which the remitting power of the Secretary does not extend. In making up this replication, the party ought to have felt the real difficulties of his case. It is generally true, that the rules of pleading furnish the best test of a right of action. The effect, in this case, was to introduce a new personage into the cause; and if I were disposed to get rid of the question, on a technical ground, I should find no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there is a departure in this plea, and he has abated his writ. How, in fact, the name of the United States comes at all to be used in this cause, is to me a mystery. The very policy of the law in this part of its revenue system is avoided by it, and would be frustrated, if the practice could be countenanced. That the name of the United States should be used against its will, and an attorney for the United States nominated by a judge, to act where [*302 the attorney of the United *States refuses to act, and that without any authority by statute, I acknowledge has excited my surprise.

The principles asserted are, that an absolute interest as vested by law in the collector; that the United States are the trustees to their use; that the act of the trustee shall not defeat the interests of the cestui que use, and that he shall have the use of the trustee's name to vindicate his rights, that, too, in an action for damages.

The whole of this thing appears to me to be wrong. If the right was an absolute, substantive, individual right, why was not the suit brought in the name of the collector? If his interest is only an equitable interest, by what known rules of pleading can he avail himself of his mere equitable interest in a suit at law? or rather, can he make his appearance as party in the suit instituted by his trustee? and that, too, a suit for damages? It all results in a strong attempt to modify the operation of our laws, and to regulate the rights and powers of our officers, by some fancied analogy with the British laws of trade, and British revenue officers.

Our system is a peculiar system; and nothing is clearer to my mind, than that, in many particulars it is constructed with a view to avoid that very analogy which is here set up, and those consequences and embarrassments which might grow out of it. In the instance before us, relief was to be provided for a case of misfortune and of innocence, and nothing could have been more absurd than to suffer the vested rights of informers *and seizing offi- [*303 cers to embarrass the government in its benevolent and just views towards the objects of this law. Mercy and justice could only have been administered by halves. if collectors could have hurried causes to judgment, and then clung to the one-half of the forfeiture, in contempt of the cries of distress, or the mandates of the Secretary. Hence, according to our system, all the suits to be instituted under the laws over which the Secretary's power extends, are commenced in the name of the United States. No other party is permitted to sue; they are all made national prosecutions; all the legal actors are those who are bound in obedience to the government that prosecutes. Nothing is more untenable than the idea that at any one stage of the prosecution the government assumes the character of a trustee; an idea so abhorrent to the principles of the common law, that to make the King a trustee was to make him absolute proprietor. Nor is it until the character of prosecutor for offenses against itself is put off, that the law raises a state of things in which the relation of trustee and cestui que use actually can arise. This is when the money is paid into the hands of the collector. To him the law directs that it shall be paid, in order that it may be distributed. What right, I would ask, would any one of distributees here have to move the court that the money be paid to him, and not to the collector? There are cases in which other persons than a collector may be entitled in the capacity of informers, and it may then be necessary for the *court to decide on indi- [304 vidual rights. But in no case, that I am aware of, arising under the collection law, can the court be called upon to pay the money in any other way than to the collector, to be by him distributed; and this distribution I consider as a mere boon from the government, which they may justly, and do practically, reserve a soverign control over, until so paid under their laws. The gift is from them, of a thing perfected to them, and they may modify and withdraw that gift, ad libitum. When once paid away, according to legislative will. their control is at an end, and the right then and not till then, becomes vested and absolute. as between them and their officers, whom, to the last, the law regards as absolute donees. That such is the view of the legislature, and that in the exercise of that discretion, they still meant to be reasonable and just, and not to exercise an ex post facto power in such case, is all conclusively proved in the third section of this act, as had been very justly insisted on in argument. During two years, this power of the Secretary had remained suspended, and with regard to rights accruing during that time, the legislature declares that as the modification imposed upon the grant to the informer, or seizing officer, by virtue of that dispensing power. did not then exist, their proportions should not afterwards be subjected to it, but the court may assess their proportions in a summary manner. There cannot be a more explicit declaration of legislative understanding than this clause presents. inasmuch as it makes no dis-305] crimination *between the cases of judgment and other cases, but considers the right accruing to them the same before judgment as it is after.

There is one peculiarity in this case, which, in my opinion. precludes the possibility of recovery, independently of the general principle; which is, that this action is brought against the marshal for not executing process issuing from another state. It certainly presents a dilemma from which I think it impossible for the party plaintiff to escape. The right to issue such process originates in the 6th section of the "act more effectually to provide for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money," by the words of which the power is explicitly confined to the case of executions on judgments obtained for the use of the United States.

The real plaintiff here, then, is reduced to this alternative: Either the judgment was for his use or it was not. If not for his use, then he cannot be damnified by the defendant in refusing to execute it. But if for his use, it cannot be for the use of the United States. and then the execution issued wrongfully, and was rightfully disobeyed. If it be replied, that the judgment, in the first place, was obtained for the use of the United States, it only brings us back to what I before observed, that so entirely is this true, as to raise no vested right in any one on the solitary ground of an eventual contingent interest.

Judgment affirmed.

306*] [*Prize. Non-commissioned Captor.]

THE DOS HERMANOS. Shields, Claimant.

Seizures made, jure belli, by non-commissioned captors, are made for the government, and no title of prize can be derived but from the prize acts.

A non-commissioned captor can only proceed in the prize court as for salvage, the amount of which is discretionary.

The appellate court will not interfere in the exercise of this discretion, as to the amount of salvage allowed, unless in a very clear case of mistake.

An appeal under the judiciary acts of 1789, c. 20, s. 22, and of 1803, c. 353 (XCIII.) prayed for, and allowed within five years, is valid, although the security was not given until after the lapse of five years.

The mode of taking the security, and the time for perfecting it, are within the discretion of the court below, and this court will not interfere with the exercise of that discretion.

APPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

This was the same case, reported ante, Vol. II., p. 76, where the decree of the court below, condemning the cargo as enemy's property, was affirmed by this court, reserving the question as to the distribution of the prize proceeds. The original capture was made by Mr. Shields, a purser of the navy, in the year 1814, in a barge armed and fitted out to cruise, but not regularly attached to the navy. The cause was remanded to the court below for further proceedings, and that court decreed the proceeds to be equally distributed between the United States and the captor, *without [*307 deducting the captor's expenses. From this decree the captor appealed to this court.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, for the appellants, stated that it had been generally considered by the text-writers, and courts of prize, that the right to captures, jure belli, was in the government, and that no individual could derive any rights of prize but from the express grant of the government.[1] But, on principle, every individual is in a state of war with the enemies of his country; and the common law certainly considers the law of nations as authorizing any subject of the belligerent state to seize enemy's property within the realm, or the property of other subjects previously captured by the enemy to the exclusion of the King, the admiral, and the owner, unless the latter came the same day they were taken, and claimed them ante occasum solis.[2] To the same effect is the case in the book of the 7th Edw. IV., 14.

The principle is, that personal effects, seized in war, are acquired to the taker by occupancy; and immovables, such as cities, lands, etc., to the public.[3] But the crown, always rapacious, and seeking to extend its final prerogative, subsequently introduced the doctrine of public title to personal things taken in war. Thus the statute *34 Edw. III., c. 1, declares that [*308 the crown was always seized of the forfeitures of war; and hence came the doctrine of the droits of admiralty.[4] It does not appear that this assumption has ever been expressly recognized by this court as a part of the law of this country; and, unquestionably, a non-commissioned captor may seize enemy's property,[5] and after a condemnation, as in this case, it must be adjudged to the captors. It is now too late for the government to interpose its claim. The act of the 23d of April, 1800, c. 189 (XXXIII.), s. 5, and the prize act of 1812, c. 430 (CVII.), gives the proceeds of vessels and goods, adjudged good prize, to the captors. But at all events, the captors are entitled to be repaid their expenses, and to a liberal salvage.[6]

6.—The San Bernardo, 1 Rob. 178; The Haase, Id. 24.

The Attorney-General, contra, argued that it was established as an elementary principle in the law of prize, that all captures jure belli, enured to the public, and that the actual captors could only derive their title from the grant of the government. This was the case with commissioned captors, and still more emphatically as to non-commissioned captors; who, though they had a right to seize enemy's property, could claim no title to the proceeds upon adjudication, except what was derived from the bounty of the public.[1] Whatever might have [*309] been the ancient *common law doctrine in England, it had been long since settled in that country that all rights of prize were derived from the grant of the crown. Without entering into all the distinctions as to the capacity in which the crown took, whether in the King's office of admiral, or ure coronæ, it might be laid down as a general proposition, that non-commissioned captors, as a matter of strict right, were not entitled to any share of the prizes captured by them. Captures made by tenders or boats, sent out by officers of the navy, but not regularly attached by public authority to the navy, are condemned as droits of admiralty.[2] But in these, and all other cases of seizures by non-commissioned captors, it was usual to reward the takers with a liberal share of the property, in the discretion of the Court of Admiralty.[3] There was no reason why any different principle or mode of proceeding should be adopted in this country. It does not depend upon any peculiar municipal regulations, but grows out of a principle recognized by all the writers on public law: Bello parta cedunt reipublicæ.[4] In the present case, a moiety of the proceeds had been allowed to the actual captors as salvage; but the provisions in the prize acts for the distribution of prizes were confined to commissioned public and private armed vessels.

[*310] *Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, that whatever might have been the ancient doctrine in England in respect to captures in war, it is now clearly established in that kingdom, that all captures jure belli, are made for the government, and that no title of prize can be acquired but by the public acts of the government conferring rights on the captors. If the original law of England authorized an individual to acquire to his own use the property of an individual, without any express authority from the public, that law was changed long before the settlement of this country. It never was the law of this country. Before the revolution, all captures from the enemy accrued to the government, to be distributed according to law; and the revolution could not strip the government of this exclusive prerogative, and vest it in individuals. It is, then, the settled law of the United States, that all captures made by non-commissioned captors, are made for the government; and since the provisions in the prize acts, as to the distribution of prize proceeds, are confined to public and private armed vessels, cruising under a regular commission, the only claim which can be sustained by the captors, in cases like the present, must be in the nature of salvage for bringing in and preserving the property.

In the present case, the District Court have awarded one-half of the prize proceeds, or salvage, to the captors. It was an exercise of sound discretion; and this court would, with extreme reluctance, interfere with that discretion, unless *in a very clear case of mis- [*311 take. We perceive no such mistake in this case, and are well satisfied with the amount of the salvage as decreed by the District Court.

As to the question which has been made, whether the appeal was in due time, it appears that the appeal was prayed for within five years, and was actually allowed by the court within that period. It is true that the security required by law was not given until after the lapse of the five years; and, under such circumstances, the court might have disallowed the appeal, and refused the security. But, as the court accepted it, it must be considered as a sufficient compliance with the order of the court, and that it had relation back to the time of the allowance of the appeal. The mode of taking the security, and the time for perfecting it, are matters of discretion, to be regulated by the court granting the appeal; and when its order is complied with, the whole has relation back to the time when the appeal was prayed. We must presume the security was given, in this case, according to the rule prescribed by the District Court, and the appeal was therefore in time.

Decree affirmed with costs.

[*Slave Trade Acts. Instance Court.]
[*312

THE JOSEFA SEGUNDA.

Roberts et al., Claimants.

The district courts have jurisdiction, under the slave trade acts, to determine who are the actual captors, under a state law made in pursuance of the 4th section of the slave trade act of 1807, c. 77, and directing the proceeds of the sale of the negroes to be paid, "one moiety for the use of the commanding officer of the capturing vessel," etc.

In order to constitute a valid seizure, so as to entitle the party to the proceeds of a forfeiture, there must be an open, visible possession claimed, and authority exercised, under the seizure.

A seizure, once voluntarily abandoned, loses its validity.

A seizure, not followed by an actual prosecution, or by a claim, in the District Court, before a hearing on the merits, insisting on the benefit of the seizure, becomes a nullity.

Under the 7th section of the slave trade act of 1807, c. 77, the entire proceeds of the vessel are forfeited to the use of the United States, unless the seizure be made by armed vessels of the navy, or by revenue cutters, in which case distribution is to be made in the same manner as prizes taken from the enemy.

Under the act of the state of Louisiana of the 13th of March, 1818, passed to carry into effect the 4th section of the slave trade act of Congress of 1807, c. 77, and directing the negroes imported contrary to the act to be sold, and the proceeds to be paid, "one moiety for the use of the commanding officer of the capturing vessel, and the other moiety to the treasurer of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, for the use and benefit of the said hospital;" no other person is entitled to the first moiety than the commanding officer of the armed [*313

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Louisiana.

313*] *This is the same case which was reported ante, Vol. V., p. 338. It was a proceeding against the vessel, and the negroes taken on board of her, under the slave trade act of the 3d of March, 1807, c. 77, in which the vessel was condemned in the court below, and that decree was affirmed on appeal, by this court. After the condemnation of the vessel in the District Court, and before the appeal to this court, the negroes found on board of her were (under the 4th section of the act of Congress, and under an act of the state of Louisiana, passed on the 13th of March, 1818, in pursuance of the act of Congress) delivered by the collector of the customs for the port of New Orleans, to the sheriff of the parish of New Orleans, for sale according to law. A cross libel was afterwards filed by the alleged original Spanish owners, claiming restitution of the negroes, which was dismissed, and, on appeal, the decree affirmed by this court. By consent of all the parties in interest, the negroes were sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds lodged in the Bank of the United States, subject to the order of the court below. After the cause had been remanded to the District Court, a question arose in that court respecting the manner in which these proceeds, as well as those of the vessel and effects, were to be distributed, and the parties respectively entitled to them. Mr. Roberts, an inspector of the revenue, claimed a moiety of the proceeds as the original seizor or captor; Messrs. Gardner, Meade and Humphrey, respectively, made similar claims under subse-
314*] quent *military seizures alleged to be made by them; and Mr. Chew, the collector of the port of New Orleans, conjointly with the naval officer and surveyor of the port, filed a like claim as the true and actual captors and seizors, who made the last and only effectual seizure, and prosecuted the same to a final sentence of condemnation.[1]

315*] It appeared, by the evidence, that Roberts, being employed as an inspector in a revenue boat at the Balize, near the mouth of 316] the Mississippi, *on the 18th of April, 1818, boarded the vessel, and declared that he had seized her. He soon afterwards went on shore, and put a person on board to take charge of the vessel, which remained at anchor opposite the block-house, until the 21st of April, when Lieutenant Meade, with six soldiers in a boat, went from Fort St. Philip, in company with a custom-house boat, and Mr. Gardner, an officer of the customs, on board, took possession of the vessel, and brought her up under the guns of the fort. It appeared that Roberts afterwards came on board the vessel, but did not remain on board until her arrival at the city of New Orleans, he having left her in order to board another vessel in the river. On the 21st of April, Mr. Chew, the collector at New Orleans, acting on independent information which he had received, sent an armed revenue boat, with an inspector of the customs, down the river, with instructions to seize the vessel. On arriving at *Fort St. Philip, [*317 they found the vessel at anchor opposite the fort, with a sergeant's guard on board, which had been placed there by Major Humphrey, the commanding officer at the fort. The inspector received from that officer the ship's papers, and took possession of the vessel and negroes, the guard having been withdrawn, and brought them up to the city of New Orleans. Proceedings were commenced against the property at the instance of Mr. Chew, and the other officers of the customs, and though his name was not inserted in the libel, the prosecution was conducted by him until its final determination, and the other parties claiming as captors, or seizors, did not intervene until after the decree of this court on the appeal in the original cause.

The court below pronounced a decree, dismissing the claim of Messrs. Roberts, Humphrey, Meade and Gardner, and allowing that of the collector and other officers of the customs, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. Livingston, for the appellant, Roberts, insisted that he was entitled as the first seizor, under the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1807, c. 77, s. 7, and the act of the legislature of Louisiana, passed on the 13th of March, 1818, in pursuance of the act of Congress, to a moiety of the proceeds of the vessel and negroes found on board. He exercised all the authority and control over the vessel he was capable of, with

1.—The act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1807, c. 77, s. 4, after providing a personal penalty for taking on board, receiving or transporting any negro, etc., from Africa, or any other foreign country, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, in any part of the United States, enacts, that "every such ship or vessel, in which such negro, mulatto or person of color shall have been taken on board, received or transported as aforesaid, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any of the circuit courts or district courts in the district where the said ship or vessel may be found or seized. And neither the importer, nor any person claiming from or under him, shall hold any right or title whatsoever to any negro, mulatto or person of color, nor to the service or labor thereof, who may be imported or brought within the United States, or territories thereof, in violation of this law, but the same shall remain subject to any regulations not contravening the provisions of this act, which the legislatures of the several states or territories at any time hereafter may make, for disposing of any such negro, mulatto or person of color." s. 7. "That of any ship or vessel shall be found, from and after the first day of January, 1808, in any river, port, bay or harbor, or on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or hovering on the coasts thereof, having on board any negro, mulatto or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with intent to land the same in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, contrary to the prohibition of this act, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted and condemned in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, should he deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be manned and employed to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of this act, and to instruct and direct the commanders of armed vessels of the United States, to seize, take and bring into any port of the United States, the force at his disposition. The persons on board submitted to the seizure; and, as in cap-318*] tures *jure belli, it is not necessary that there should be a physical superiority of force on the part of the captors.[1] He was afterwards compelled to abandon the possession; and such an abandonment, from the force and fear of another party, cannot invalidate the original seizure.[2] By the act of Congress (s. 7), the proceeds of the vessel and effects are to be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall make the seizure; and by the act of Louisiana, the proceeds of the negroes are to be divided equally between the commanding officer of the capturing vessel and the Charity Hospital. The appellant, Roberts, is entitled to both capacities; and the revenue officers, who came in after the capture was complete, and dispossessed him who was the first seizor, can have no claim under either act.

Mr. Key, for the appellants, Gardner, Meade and Humphrey, argued upon the facts, to show that they were the real, meritorious captors.

The Attorney-General, for the respondents, insisted that if any of the parties before the court were entitled, the collector and other officers of the customs were the only parties entitled by law to be considered as the captors or seizors, they having made the first effectual seizure, and prosecuted it to condemnation, whilst the other claimants avoided all the ex-319*] pense and *hazard of the prosecution, and did not intervene until its successful termination. The law does not mean to encourage that kind of seizure, where the captor lays his hand on the subject and takes it off again. That person is the seizor who informs and prosecutes. If any other person claims a title, he is bound to intervene before the first adjudication, and submit his claim to the decision of the court.[3] It may be doubted, whether, under the 7th section of the act of Congress, any person can be entitled, as a seizor, except the officers, etc., of the armed vessels and revenue cutters of the United States. If it be a casus omissus, none of the captors now before the court are literally within the terms of the act, and the whole of the forfeiture must be to the United States. But, if any are entitled, the collector is clearly to be preferred.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court.

The case of The Josefa Segunda, in which the present controversy had its origin, is reported in the fifth volume of Mr. Wheaton's Reports. It is only necessary to mention, that after the condemnation of the vessel, in the District Court of Louisiana, and before the intervention of the appeal to this court, the negroes seized on board of her, in pursuance of the act of Congress, and the act of Louisiana, which will be hereafter commented on, were delivered by Mr. Chew (the *collector [*320 of the customs) to the sheriff of the parish of New Orleans, to be sold according to law; and a few days afterwards a new libel, claiming the property of the negroes, having been filed by the Spanish owners (which was afterwards dismissed, and on appeal, the dismissal confirmed by this court), by consent of all the parties in interest the negroes were sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds lodged in the Bank of the United States, subject to the order of the District Court. The question now in contestation respects the manner in which the proceeds of this sale, as well as of the sale of the vessel and effects, are to be distributed, and the parties who are entitled to them. Mr. Roberts, who is an inspector of the customs, claims title as the original seizor or captor; Messrs. Gardner, Meade and Humphrey make a like claim under a subsequent military seizure made by them; and Mr. Chew, and the surveyor and naval officer of the port of New Orleans, a like claim as the true and actual captors and seizors, who made the last and only effectual seizure, and prosecuted the same to a final decree of condemnation.

Mr. Chew caused the original libel against the vessel to be brought, and though his name is accidently omitted in it as the officer through whose instrumentality the seizure was made, yet it is admitted, and indeed could not be denied, that he was the sole responsible prosecutor of the suit, until the final condemnation of the vessel, and the final dismissal of the second libel, *brought by the original Spanish [*321 claimants. The claims of all the other parties such ships or vessels, and moreover to seize, take and bring into any port of the United States, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found on the high seas, contravening the provisions of this act, to be proceeded against according to law," etc. "And the proceeds of all ships and vessels, their tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods and effects on board of them, which shall be so seized, prosecuted and condemned, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall make such seizure, take or bring the same into port for condemnation, whether such seizure be made by an armed vessel of the United States or revenue cutters thereof; and the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy: Provided, That the officers and men, to be entitled to one-half of the proceeds aforesaid, shall safe keep every negro, mulatto or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel so by them seized, taken or brought into court for condemnation, and shall deliver every such negro, mulatto, or person of color to such person or persons as shall be appointed by the respective states to receive the same; and if no such person or persons shall be appointed by the respective states, they shall deliver every such negro, mulatto or person of color to the overseers of the poor of the port or place where such ship or vessel may be brought or found, and shall immediately transmit to the Governor, or Chief Magistrate of the state, an account of their proceedings, together with the number of such negroes, mulattoes or persons of color, and a descriptive list of the same, that he may give directions respecting such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color." The act of the legislature of the state of Louisiana, passed on the 13th of March, 1818, after reciting the substance of the above 4th section of the act of Congress, proceeds to declare that the sheriff of the parish of New Orleans is authorized and required to receive any negro, etc., delivered to him in virtue of the act of Congress, until the proper court pronounces a decree of condemnation; and after such condemnation, it authorizes him to sell such negro, etc., as a slave for life; and then declares "that the proceeds of such sale shall, after deducting all charges, be paid over by the said sheriff, one moiety for the use of the commanding officer of the capturing vessel, and the other moiety to the treasurer of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, for the use and benefit of the said hospital."

now before the court, adverse to that of Mr. Chew, have intervened since the final judgment pronounced in the Supreme Court in the cause.

The Josefa Segunda was finally condemned under the seventh section of the slave trade act of the 2d of March, 1807, ch. 77. It will be necessary to refer to the terms of that section at large, because the question here respects as well the distribution of the proceeds of the vessel (which must be made according to the rules prescribed in that section) as of the proceeds of the sale of the negroes, who were unlawfuly brought into the United States; and, in the progress of the discussion, it will materially aid us in the decision of the latter, to ascertain who, by the construction of that section, are the captors entitled to the distribution of the former.

The fourth section of the act of 1807 provides that "neither the importer, nor any person or persons claiming from or under him, shall hold any right or title whatsoever to any negro, etc., who may be imported or brought within the United States, or territories thereof, in violation of this law; but the same shall remain subject to any regulations, not contravening the provisions of this act, which the legislatures of the several states or territories, at any time hereafter, may make for disposing of any such negro," etc. Accordingly, the legislature of Louisiana, on the 13th of March, 1818, passed an act avowedly to meet the exigency of this section, which act, after 322*] *reciting the substance of the same section, proceeds to declare that the sheriff of the parish of New Orleans is authorized and required to receive any negro, etc., delivered to him in virtue of the act of Congress, until the proper court pronounces a decree of condemnation; and after such condemnation, it authorizes him to sell such negro, etc., as a slave for life; and then declares that "the proceeds of such sale shall, after deducting all charges, be paid over by the said sheriff, one moiety for the use of the commanding officer of the capturing vessel, and the other moiety to the treasurer of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, for the use and benefit of the said hospital." There is no doubt that this act is not in contravention of the intention of the act of Congress, for the sixth section contains a proviso, recognizing the validity of such a sale, when made under the authority of a state law.

Some objection has been suggested as to the jurisdiction of the District Court of Louisiana to entertain the present proceedings, upon the ground that the distribution is to be made under this act by the sheriff of New Orleans. But upon a full consideration of the act of 1807, we are of opinion that the objection cannot be maintained. By the judiciary act of 1789, as well as by the express provisions of the act of 1807, the District Court has jurisdiction over seizures made under the latter act. The principal proceedings are certainly to be against the vessel, and the goods and effects 323*] found on board. But *the negroes are also to be taken possession of, for the purpose of being delivered over to the state governments, according to the provision of the act; and it is obvious that this delivery can only be after a condemnation has occurred, since it is only in that event that the state legislature can acquire any right to dispose of them. The proviso in the seventh section, that the officers to whom a moiety of the proceeds is given on condemnation, shall be so entitled only in case they safely keep and deliver over to the negroes according to the laws of the states, operates by way of condition to the completion of their title; but does not import any requirement that the delivery shall be until after the condemnation. On the contrary, as by a decree of restitution of the vessel and effects, the claimants would be entitled to a restitution of the negroes, the reasonable construction seems to be that they remain subject to the order of the District Court, as property in the custody of the law, though in the actual possession of the seizing officers. The possession of the latter is the possession of the court, as much in respect to the negroes as the vessel and cargo; and it must remain until the court, by pronouncing a final decree, directs in what manner it is to be surrendered. In the present case, the negroes were sold, and the proceeds substituted for them were in the custody of the court. It was therefore authorized to deliver them over to the parties who should be entitled, under the state law. In terms, the state law required the delivery to the sheriff to the *use of the parties; but who the par- [*324 ties were to whose use the sheriff must hold them, could not be ascertained by him, but must be awarded by the court, to whom, as an incident to the principal cause, it exclusively belonged. In what manner could any other court be authorized to ascertain who was the commanding officer of the capturing vessel? The decree of the court, in distributing the proceeds of the vessel and cargo, must necessarily involve this inquiry; and certainly it cannot for a moment be maintained in argument that any other person than the commander of the capturing vessel, who would share the proceeds of the prize and her cargo, could be within the meaning of the law of Louisiana. The common form of drawing up decrees, in cases of condemnation, is, that the proceeds be distributed according to law. But if any difficulty arises, upon petition, the court always proceeds to decide who are the parties entitled to distribution, and to make a supplementary decree. But it may do the same in the first instance, and make the particulars of the distribution a part of the original decree. In the present case, if the original decree had been drawn out at large, it ought to have been, that the negroes so captured be delivered over to the sheriff of New Orleans for sale, according to the act of Louisiana in this behalf provided, and that the net proceeds of the sale be afterwards paid over, viz., one moiety to A. B., adjudged by the court to be the commanding officer of the capturing vessel, and the other moiety to the Charity Hospital of *New Orleans. This course of proceed- [*325 ing is very familiar in prize causes; where the Court of Admiralty always ascertains who are the captors entitled to the prize proceeds; and the courts of common law will never entertain any jurisdiction over the proceeds until after such adjudication. Considering this cause then, as a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, belonging exclusively to the courts of the United States, we are not aware how any other court could adjudge upon the question who were the captors or seizors entitled to share the proceeds; and we think that the District Court has jurisdiction over the present proceedings.

In respect to the claim of Mr. Roberts, we do not think that the evidence establishes that he ever made any valid seizure of the vessel. It is not sufficient that he intended to make one, or that, on some occasions, he expressed to third persons that he had so done. There must be an open, visible possession claimed, and authority exercised under a seizure. The parties must understand that they are dispossessed, and that they are no longer at liberty to exercise any dominion on board of the ship. It is true, that a superior physical force is not necessary to be employed, if there is a voluntary acquiescence in the seizure and dispossesion. If the party, upon notice, agrees to submit, and actually submits, to the command and control of the seizing officer, that is sufficient; for, in such cases, as in cases of captures jure belli, a voluntary surrender of authority, and an agreement 326*] to obey the captor, *supplies the place of actual force. But here, Mr. Roberts gave no notice of the seizure to the persons on board; he exercised no authority, and claimed no possession. He had no force adequate to compel submission; and his appearance in the vessel gave no other character to him than that of an inspector, rightfully on board, in performance of his ordinary duties. To construe such an equivocal act as a seizure, would be unsettling principles.

Messrs. Humphrey, Meade and Gardner, certainly did make a seizure, by their open possession of the vessel, and bringing her under the guns of Fort St. Philip. But there is this objection to the seizure, both of Mr. Roberts (assuming that he made one) and of the other persons, that it was never followed up by any subsequent prosecution or proceedings. The seizure of Messrs. Humphrey, Meade and Gardner, seems to have been voluntarily abandoned by them; and even that of Mr. Roberts, if he made one, does not seem to have been persisted in. Now, a seizure, or capture—call it which we may—if once abandoned, without the influence of superior force, loses all its validity and becomes a complete nullity. Like the common case of a capture at sea, and a voluntary abandonment, it leaves the property open to the next occupant. But what is decisive in our view is, that neither of these gentlemen ever attempted any prosecution, or intervened in the original proceedings in the District Court, claiming to be seizors, which was indispensable to consummate their legal right; and their 327*] claim *was, for the first time, made after a final decree of condemnation in the Supreme Court. This was certainly a direct waiver of any right acquired by their original seizures. It is not permitted to parties to lie by and allow other persons to incur all the hazards and responsibility of being held to damages in case the seizure turns out to be wrongful, and then to come in, after the peril is over, and claim the whole reward. Such a proceeding would be utterly unjust and inadmissible. If the parties meant to have insisted on any right, as seizors, their duty was to have intervened in the District Court before the hearing on the merits, according to the course pointed out by Lord Hale in the passage cited at the bar, where there are several persons claiming to be seizors of forfeited property.[1] In the present case, Mr. Chew actually advanced a considerable sum of money for the maintenance of these negroes during the pendency of the suit; and if it had been unsuccessful he must have exclusively borne the loss. Upon the plain ground, then, that Mr. Roberts, and Messrs. Humphrey, Meade and Gardner, have not followed up their seizure by any prosecution, such as the act of 1807 requires, we are *of opinion that there is no foundation, [*328 in point of law, for their claims.

That Mr. Chew, on behalf of himself, and the surveyor and naval officer of the port of New Orleans, did make the seizure on which the prosecution in this case was founded, is completely proved by the evidence; it is also admitted by the United States, in their answer to the libel of Messrs. Carricabera, etc., the Spanish claimants, and is averred by Mr. Chew, and his coadjutors, in their separate allegation and answer to the same libel. While the vessel lay at Fort St. Philip, armed boats, under revenue officers, were sent down by him, with orders to seize her, and bring her up to New Orleans for prosecution, which was done accordingly.

The remaining question, then, is, whether Mr. Chew, for himself and his coadjutors in office, is to be considered as entitled to the proceeds of the vessel under the act of Congress, and to the proceeds of the negroes, as "the commanding officer of the capturing vessel," within the sense of the Louisiana law.

If he is entitled to the proceeds of the vessel and cargo, under the 7th section of the act of 1807, then, we think, he must be fairly considered as within the spirit, if not the letter, of the act of Louisiana.

The 7th section is certainly not without difficulty in its construction. In the first clause it declares, that vessels found "in any river, port, bay or harbor, or on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or *hovering on the coast thereof, having [*329 on board any negro, etc., for the purpose of selling them as slaves, etc., contrary to the prohibitions of this act, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof." Under this clause, standing alone, it cannot be doubted that any person might lawfully seize such a vessel at his peril, and if the United States should choose to adopt his act, and proceed to adjudication, he would, in the event of a condemnation, be completely justified. But it may be considered as peculiarly the duty of the officers of the customs, to watch over any maritime infractions of the laws of the United States; and, by the collection act of 1799, ch. 128, s. 70, it is made the duty of all custom-house officers, as well within their districts as without, to make seizures of all vessels violating the revenue laws.

1.—Harg. Law Tracts (4to.), p. 227. "At common law, any person might seize uncustomed goods to the use of the King and himself, and thereupon inform for a seizure. But yet, if A seize goods uncustomed, and then B seize them for the same cause, he that first seizeth ought to be preferred as the informer. And therefore, if B, that seized after, first inform, and A also inform, A may be admitted to interplead with B. upon the priority of the seizure, before the merchant shall be put to answer either."

The section, then, in the next clause, authorizes the President of the United States to employ any of the armed vessels of the United States to cruise on any part of the coast, to prevent violations of the act, and to instruct and direct the commanders of such armed vessels, to seize all vessels contravening the act, "wheresoever found on the high seas," omitting the words, "in any river, port, bay or harbor," contained in the former clause. It then proceeds to declare that the proceeds of all such vessels, when condemned, "shall be divided equally between the United States, and the officers and men who shall make such 330*] seizure, take or bring the same into port for condemnation, whether such service be made by an armed vessel of the United States, or revenue cutters thereof, and the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy." In a strict sense, the present seizure was not made by an armed vessel of the United States, nor by a revenue cutter, which, by the act of 1799, ch. 128, s. 98, the President is at liberty to require to co-operate with the navy. But if we consider these cases as put only by way of example, or if we give an enlarged meaning to the words "revenue cutter," so as to include revenue boats, such as the collector is, by the act of 1799, ch. 128, s. 101, authorized to employ, with the approbation of the treasury department, then the seizure of Mr. Chew may be brought within the general terms of the act. The United States do not appear to have resisted this construction as to the proceeds of the sale of the Josefa Segunda. And, on the other hand, if we consider that the act meant to deal out the same rights to all parties who might seize the offending vessel, whether they were officers of armed vessels, or of revenue cutters, or merely private individuals, who may seize and prosecute to condemnation, then, under that construction, Mr. Chew may be properly deemed the seizing officer, entitled, with his crew, to the proceeds of the vessel. If such a construction is not admissible, within the equity of the act, then it is a casus 331] omissus, *and the property yet remains undisposed of by law.

Upon the best consideration which we have been able to give the case, we are of opinion that it is a casus omissus, or rather, that all the beneficial interest vests in the United States. The first clause of the seventh section declares that all vessels offending against it, "shall be forfeited to the use of the United States," and may be seized, prosecuted and condemned, accordingly. The seizure may be made by any person; but the forfeiture is still to be, by the terms of the act, for the use of the United States. If the act had stopped here, no difficulty in its construction could have occurred. As nothing is given by it to the seizing officer, nothing could be claimed by him except from the bounty of the government. The subsequent clause looks exclusively to cases where the seizure is made by armed vessels of the navy, or by revenue cutters, and directs, in such an event, a distribution to be made in the same manner as in cases of prizes taken from an enemy. Correctly speaking, these cases constitute exceptions from the preceding clause, and take them out of the general forfeiture "to the use of the United States." It might have been a wise policy to have extended the benefit of these provisions much farther, or to have given, as the act of the 20th of April, 1818, ch. 85, has given, a moiety in all cases to the person who should prosecute the seizure to effect. But courts of law can deal with questions of this nature only so far as the legislature has clearly *expressed [*332 its will. Mr. Chew appears to be a very meritorious officer, and deserving of public respect for his good conduct on this occasion. But as the act has made no provision for his compensation, he must be left, in common with those who made the military seizure, to the liberality of the government.

The remarks which have been already made, dispose of the case, so far as respects the proceeds of the vessel, and we think they are decisive as to the claim to the proceeds of sale of the negroes. The case as to this matter is also a casus omissus in the act of Louisiana. That act had a direct reference to the act of Congress, and "the commanding officer of the capturing vessel," in the sense of the former, must mean the commanding officer of such an armed vessel, or revenue cutter, as is entitled to share in the distribution of the proceeds by the latter. It would be going very far to give a larger construction to the words than in their strict form they import; and since they admit of a reasonable interpretation, by confining them to the cases provided for by Congress, we are satisfied that our duty is complied with, by assigning to them this unembarrassed limitation.

The decree of the District Court, so far as it dismisses the claims of Messrs. Roberts, Humphrey, Meade and Gardner, is affirmed, and so far as it sustains the claim of Mr. Chew, and the naval officer and surveyor of the port of New Orleans, is reversed.

Decree accordingly.

THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS, AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

v.

THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS, AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

In general, a payment received in forged paper, or in any base coin, is not good; and if there be no negligence in the party, he may recover back the consideration paid for them, or sue upon his original demand.

But this principle does not apply to a payment made bona fide to a bank, in its own notes, which are received as cash, and afterwards discovered to be forged.

In case of such a payment upon general account, an action may be maintained by the party paying the notes, if there is a balance due him from the bank upon their general account, either upon an insimul computassent, or as for money had and received.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Georgia.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the plaintiffs in error, the president, etc., of the Bank of the United States, against the defendants in error, the president, etc., of the Bank of the state of Georgia, in which the plaintiffs declared for the balance of an account stated, and for money had and received to their use. At the trial, the plaintiffs offered evidence to prove that mutual dealings existed between the parties, in the course of which, each being in the receipt of the bills of the other, they mutually paid in or deposited the bills of the other 334*] party, at intervals, as *each found the bills of the other party had accumulated to any considerable amount in their respective vaults; and upon each of such payments or deposits, the amount thereof was entered as so much "cash" in the customer's book of the party depositing, by the proper officer of the bank receiving the same; from which said book of the plaintiffs, which was given in evidence, it appeared that the sum of $6,900 was the balance due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, at the time of instituting this action. The plaintiffs also offered evidence, that the transactions between the parties were almost exclusively in the deposits of their respective bills as aforesaid. And the defendants, to maintain their said defense, offered evidence to prove that, in one of the said deposits so made by the plaintiffs, in the bank of the defendants, and so entered in the said book of the plaintiffs by the proper officer of the defendants, at the time the said deposit was made, to wit, on the 25th of February, in the year 1819, and which is one of the items comprised in the account upon which the balance was claimed by the plaintiffs, there were paid in 38 bills of the defendants' own issues or notes, of $5.00 each, which had been fraudulently altered by some person or persons unknown, from the denomination of 5 to that of 50; and 40 bills of the defendants' own issues or notes of $10.00 each, which had in like manner been fraudulently altered by some person or persons unknown, to that of hundreds, making together the sum of $5,900, demanded by the plaintiffs *in this action; which said [*335 bills or notes had been subsequently tendered by the defendants to the plaintiffs, before the institution of this action, and by the plaintiffs refused. The plaintiffs then offered evidence to prove that no notice or intimation of the said fraudulent alteration aforesaid was given by the defendants to the plaintiffs, until the 16th of March, 1819, and that the tender to return the said altered notes to the plaintiffs by the defendants, was not made until the 17th of March, 1819, nineteen days after the receipt of the said notes by the defendants from the plaintiffs, and the entry of the same in the customer's book of the plaintiffs. The defendants further offered evidence to prove that the said altered bills, so deposited by the plaintiffs and received by the defendants, had been received by the plaintiffs from the Planters' and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, concerning which notes a correspondence had taken place between the plaintiffs and the said Planters' and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, subsequently to the detection of the said fraudulent alteration, in the following words and figures, to wit:

Sir—Upon a more minute investigation of the bills received last month from Mr. Hobson, of your bank, it turns out that 40 of the $100.00 notes of the state bank, of this place, were altered *from $10.00, and 58 of the $50.00 [*336 notes of the same bank were altered from $5 notes, producing against us a difference in the $100 notes of $3,600, and in the $50, $2,610, making the whole difference $6,210. Le Roy Pope, Esq., President Bank Huntsville.

Sir—Will you suffer me to introduce to your acquaintance and kindness, the bearer, Mr. Heinemann, our teller, whose objects have already been imparted to you in my letters of 23d February and 13th inst. (copies in Mr. H.'s possession), and which, we doubt not, will receive every facility for your institution. Mr. Heinemann is also instructed to lay before you formal notice of a claim which we shall make on your bank for the spurious notes received from Mr. Hobson, in the event of our being cast in the suit about to be brought between the 337*] Bank of Georgia, and ourselves, *in the case. It has been deemed a better course than that proposed in our cashier's letter to Mr. Rawlins, your cashier, of the 17th inst., and will, no doubt, be more agreeable to you.

Your obedient servant,
R. Richardson, President.

Planters' and Merchants' Bank of Huntsville, 4th May, 1819.

Sir—Your favor under date of the 25th has been handed me by Mr. Heinemann, wherein you give me notice that your bank holds this institution bound to make good the amount of the spurious notes which you say was received from Mr. Hobson, in the event of your being cast in a suit about to be brought between the Bank of Georgia and yourselves. I am directed by the board of directors to state to you, that they highly approve of the course your bank have adopted in regard to these spurious notes, and we shall cheerfully acquiesce with the decision of the court, let that be what it may.

I am, respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
Le Roy Pope, President.

And the plaintiffs further offered evidence to prove that the officers of the defendants, at the time of receiving the said altered notes, had in their possession a certain book, called the bank *note register of the said bank of [*338 the state of Georgia, wherein were registered, and recorded, the date, number, letter, amount and payees' name, of all the notes ever issued by the said bank, by means of which, and by reference whereto, the forgeries or alterations aforesaid could have been promptly and satisfactorily detected; and further, that so far as related to the said notes purported to be the notes of $100, all the genuine notes of the defendants of that amount in circulation on the said 25th of February, 1819, were marked with the letter A, whereas twenty-three of the notes of $100 each, so received by the defendants as genuine notes, when in fact they were altered notes, bore the letters B, C, or D.

And the defendants further offered evidence to prove that the alteration in the said notes consisted in extracting the ink of certain printed figures and words which expressed the amount of said notes, and substituting therefor other printed figures and words; the signatures, and every other part of said notes, remaining unaltered. Whereupon, the parties having offered the above evidence, the plaintiffs prayed the court,

1. To instruct the jury, that if they believed the said evidence, the said plaintiffs were entitled to recover of the said defendants the whole sum of $6,900, being the balance so exhibited by their customer's book aforesaid, and as due from the said defendants to the said plaintiffs; which instruction the judges aforesaid, being divided *in opinion, refused [*339 to give; and the counsel for the plaintiffs excepted to the refusal.

2. The plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the evidence so given, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover of the defendants the sum of $690, being the original value of the altered notes; which instruction the said judges, being divided in opinion, did not give; to which refusal the said counsel for the plaintiffs excepted.

3. The plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the evidence so given, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover of the defendants the whole sum of $6,900, being the balance so exhibited by their customer's book aforesaid, as due from the defendants to merce and other business. And that this is true, not only of the money made by law a good tender in the payment of debts, but is equally so in regard to bank notes payable to bearer and circulated by delivery. See Ridenour v. Clurkin, 6 Blackf. Ind. 411. That a debt arose from the receipt of the bills of a bank chartered illegally, and were void at law, and finally proved worthless, is no defense where the bills were actually current at the time the defendant received them, and did not prove worthless in his hands, and he is not bound to take them back from persons to whom he paid them away. Orchard v. Hughes, 1 Wall. 73; Alexander v. Byers, 19 Ind. 301; Dakin v. Anderson, 18 Ind. 52.

But if the drawee of a forged bill accept and pay it, or pay it without acceptance, he cannot recover back the money from the person to whom it was paid, for the drawee is bound to know that the bill is genuine.

Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. 1354; 1 Bac. Abr. 413; Goddard v. Merchants' Bk., 4 Comst. 147; Bk. of Commerce v. Union Bk., 3 Comst. 230; Hortsman v. Henshaw, 11 How. 177; Ellis v. Ohio L. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628; Whitney v. Bunnell, 8 La. Ann. 429.

An acceptor is bound to know the drawee's hand-writing, and, if he accept a forged bill, he will, nevertheless be bound to pay it. Canal Bk. v. Bk. of Albany, 1 Hill, N. Y. 287; Peoria R. Co. v. Neill, 16 Ill. 269; Leach v. Buchanan, 4 Esp. 226; Smith v. Chester, 1 Term R. 654; Levy v. U. S. Bank, 4 Dall. 234; 1 Binn. 27; Jennings v. Fowler, 2 Strange, 946; Hoffman v. Bank, 12 Wall. 193.

Nor can the bankers of the drawee paying a forged bill on his account recover back the amount for the same reason. Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. 76; but see Martin v. Morgan, 3 Moo. 635; Wilkinson v. Johnson, 3 Burr. & C. 428; Sanderson v. Coleman, 1 Mann. & G. 209; see 2 Daniel, Neg. Instrument, s. 1655–1657, for qualifications of this rule.

A reason of the above rule as to an acceptor is that an acceptance is an admission of the signature of the drawer. 1 Daniel, Neg. Instruments, s. 533; 2 Id., s. 1225.

the plaintiffs, with legal interest thereon from the day of instituting their action aforesaid; which instruction the judges aforesaid, being divided in opinion, refused to give; to which refusal the counsel for the plaintiffs excepted.

Judgment being rendered upon this bill of exceptions, for the defendants in the court below, the cause was brought, by writ of error, to this court.

It was insisted, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the judgment ought to be reversed, on the following grounds:

1. That what took place on the 25th of February, 1819, between the parties, was not only equivalent to payment, but was payment itself; and the defendants are, in all respects, to be 340*] considered *as if they were suing to recover back the money.

2. That if understood only as an acceptance, or agreement to pay, the principal would still be the same.

3. That, in either case, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The cause was argued by Mr. Sergeant for the plaintiffs,[1] and by Mr. Berrien for the defendants.[2]

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case of great importance in a practical view, and has been very fully argued upon its merits. The Bank of Georgia having 341*] originally *issued the bank notes in question, they were, in the course of circulation, fraudulently altered, and having found their way into the Bank of the United States, the latter presented them to the former, who received them as genuine, and placed them to the general account of the Bank of the United States, as cash, by way of general deposit. The forgery was not discovered until nineteen days afterwards, upon which notice was duly given, and a tender of the notes was made to the Bank of the United States, and by them refused. Both parties are equally innocent of the fraud, and it is not disputed that the Bank of the United States were holders, bona fide, for a valuable consideration. Under these circumstances, the question arises, which of the parties is to bear the loss, or, in other words, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, in this action, the amount of this deposit.

Some observations have been made as to the form of the action, the declaration embracing counts for the balance of the account stated, as well as for money had and received, etc. But, if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all, we see no objection to a recovery upon either of these counts. The sum sued for is the balance due upon the general account of the parties, and it is money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, if the transaction entitled the plaintiffs to consider the deposit as money. It is, clearly, not the case of a special deposit, where the identical thing was to be restored by the defendants; the notes were paid as money upon general account, *and de- [*342 posited as such; so that, according to the course of business, and the understanding of the parties, the identical notes were not to be restored, but an equal amount in cash. They passed, therefore, into the general funds of the Bank of Georgia, and became the property of the bank. The action has, therefore, assumed the proper shape, and if it is maintainable upon the merits, there is no difficulty in point of form.

We may lay out of the case, at once, all consideration of the point, how far the defendants would have been liable if these notes had been the notes of any other bank, deposited by the plaintiff, in the Bank of Georgia, as cash. That might depend upon a variety of considerations, such as the usages of banks, and the implied contract resulting from their usual dealings with their customers, and upon the general principles of law applicable to cases of this nature. The modern authorities certainly do, in a strong manner, assert that a payment received in forged paper, or in any base coin, is not good; and that if there be no negligence in the party, he may recover back the consideration paid for them, or sue upon his original demand. To this effect are the authorities cited at the bar, and particularly Markle v. Hatfield, 2 Johns. Rep. 455; Young v. Adams, 6 Mass. Rep. 182, and Jones v. Ryde, 5 Taunt. Rep. 488. But, without entering upon any examination of this doctrine, it is sufficient to say that the present is not such a case. The notes in question were not the notes of another bank or the security of a third person, but *they [*343 were received and adopted by the bank as its own genuine notes, in the most absolute and unconditional manner. They were treated as cash, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff in the same manner, and with the same general intent, as if they had been genuine notes or coin.

Many considerations of public convenience and policy would authorize a distinction between cases where a bank receives forged notes purporting to be its own, and those where it receives the notes of other banks in payment, or upon general deposit. It has the benefit of circulating its own notes as currency, and commanding thereby the public confidence. It is bound to know its own paper, and provide for its payment, and must be presumed to use all reasonable means, by private marks and otherwise, to secure itself against forgeries and impositions. In point of fact, it is well known that every bank is in the habit of using secret marks, and peculiar characters, for this purpose, and of keeping a regular register of all the notes it issues, so as to guide its own discretion as to its discounts and circulation, and to enable it to detect frauds. Its own security, not less than that of the public, requires such precautions.

Under such circumstances, the receipt by a bank of forged notes, purporting to be its own, must be deemed an adoption of them. It has the means of knowing if they are genuine; if these means are not employed, it is certainly evidence of a neglect of that duty, which the public have a right to require. And in re- [*344 spect to persons *equally innocent, where one is bound to know and act upon his knowledge, and the other has no means of knowledge, there seems to be no reason for burthening the latter with any loss in exoneration of the former. There is nothing unconscientious in retaining the sum received from the bank in payment of such notes, which its own acts have deliberately assumed to be genuine. If this doctrine is applicable to ordinary cases, it must apply with greater strength to cases where the forgery has not been detected until after a considerable lapse of time. The holder, under such circumstances, may not be able to ascertain from whom he received them, or the situation of the other parties may be essentially changed. Proof of actual damage may not always be within his reach; and therefore, to confine the remedy to cases of that sort, would fall far short of the actual grievance. The law will, therefore, presume a damage actual or potential, sufficient to repel any claim against the holder. Even in relation to forged bills of third persons received in payment of a debt, there has been a qualification engrafted on the general doctrine, that the notice and return must be within a reasonable time; and any neglect will absolve the payer from responsibility.

If, indeed, we were to apply the doctrine of negligence to the present case, there are circumstances strong to show a want of due diligence and circumspection on the part of the Bank of Georgia. It appears from the statement of facts, that all the genuine notes of [*345 that bank of the denomination *of $100, in circulation at this time, were marked with the letter A; whereas twenty-three of the forged notes of $100, bore the marks of the letters B, C, and D. These facts were known to the defendants, but unknown to the plaintiff; so that by ordinary circumspection the fraud might have been detected.

The argument against this view of the subject, derived from the fact that the defendants have received no consideration to raise a promise to pay this sum, since the notes were forgeries, is certainly not of itself sufficient. There are many cases in the law, where the party has received no legal consideration, and yet in which, if he has paid the money, he cannot recover it back; and in which, if he has merely promised to pay, it may be recovered of him. The first class of cases often turns upon the point, whether in good faith and conscience the money can be justly retained; in the latter, whether there has been a credit thereby given to or by a third person, whose interest may be materially affected by the transaction. So that, to apply the doctrine of a want of consideration to any case, we must look to all the circumstances, and decide upon them all.

Passing from these general considerations, it is material to inquire how, in analogous cases, the law has dealt with this matter. The present case does not, indeed, appear to have been in terms decided in any court; but if principles have been already established, which ought to *govern it, then it is the duty of the [*346 court to follow out those principles on this occasion.

The case has been argued in two respects: first, as a case of payment, and, second, as a case of acceptance of the notes.

In respect to the first, upon the fullest examination of the facts, we are of opinion that it is a case of actual payment. We treat it, in this respect, exactly as the parties have treated it, that is, as a case where the notes have been paid and credited as cash. The notes have not been credited as notes, or as a special deposit; but the transaction is precisely the same as if the money had been first paid to the plaintiffs, and instantaneously the same money had been deposited by them. It can make no difference that the same agent is employed by both parties, the one to receive, and the other to pay and credit. Upon what principle is it, then, that the court is called upon to construe the act different from the avowed intention of the parties? It is not a case where the law construes an act done with one intent to be a different act, for the purpose of making it available in law; to do that, cy pres, which would be defective in its direct form. Here the parties were at liberty to treat it as they pleased, either as a payment of money, or as a credit of the notes. In either way it was a legal proceeding, effectual and perfect; and as no reason exists for a different construction, we think that the parties, by treating it as a cash deposit, must be deemed to have considered it as paid in money, and then deposited; since that is the only *way in which it could legal- [347 ly become, or be treated as cash. Nor is there any novelty in this view of the transaction. Bank notes constitute a part of the common currency of the country, and, ordinarily, pass as money. When they are received as payment, the receipt is always given for them as money. They are a good tender as money, unless specially objected to; and, as Lord Mansfield observed, in Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. Rep. 457, they are not, like bills of exchange, considered as mere securities or documents for debts. If this be true in respect to bank notes in general, it applies, a fortiori, to the notes of the bank which receives them; for they are then treated as money received by the bank, being the representative of so much money admitted to be in its vaults for the use of the depositor. The same view was taken of this point in the case of Levy v. The Bank of The United States, 4 Dall. Rep. 234; S. C. 1 Binn. Rep. 27, where a forged check had been accepted by the bank, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff (a depositor) as cash, and upon a subsequent discovery of the fraud, the bank refused to pay the amount. The court there said: "It is our opinion, that when the check was credited to the plaintiff as cash, it was the same thing as if it had been paid; it is for the interest of the bank that it should be so taken. In the latter case, the bank would have appeared as plaintiffs; and every mistake which could have been corrected in an action by them, may be corrected in this action, and 348] none other." The case of Bolton *v. Richards, 6 D. & E. 138, is not, in all its circumstances, directly in point; but there the court manifestly considered the carrying of a check to the credit of a party was equivalent to the transfer of so much money in the hands of the banker, to his account.

Considering, then, the credit in this case as a payment of the notes, the question arises, whether, after a payment, the defendants would be permitted to recover the money back; if they would not, then they have no right to retain the money, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a recovery in the present suit.

In Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. Rep. 1355, there were two bills of exchange which had been paid by the drawee, the drawer's handwriting being a forgery; one of these bills had been paid, when it became due, without acceptance; the other was duly accepted, and paid at maturity. Upon discovery of the fraud, the drawee brought an action against the holder to recover back the money so paid, both parties being admitted to be equally innocent. Lord Mansfield, after adverting to the nature of the action, which was for money had and received, in which no recovery could be had unless it be against conscience for the defendant to retain it, and that it could not be affirmed that it was unconscientious for the defendant to retain it, he having paid a fair and valuable consideration for the bills, said, "here was no fraud, no wrong. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to be satisfied that the bill drawn upon him was the drawer's hand, before he accepted or 349*] paid it. But it was not incumbent upon the defendant to inquire into it. There was notice given by the defendant to the plaintiff, of a bill drawn upon him, and he sends his servant to pay it, and take it up. The other bill he actually accepts, after which the defendant, innocently and bona fide, discounts it. The plaintiff lies by for a considerable time after he has paid these bills, and then found out that they were forged. He made no objection to them at the time of paying them. Whatever neglect there was, was on his side. The defendant had actual encouragement from the plaintiff for negotiating the second bill, from the plaintiff's having, without any scruple or hesitation, paid the first; and he paid the whole value bona fide. It is a misfortune which has happened without the defendant's fault or neglect. If there was no neglect in the plaintiff, yet there is no reason to throw off the loss from one innocent man upon another innocent man. But, in this case, if there was any fault or negligence in anyone, it certainly was in the plaintiff, and not in the defendant." The whole reasoning of this case applies with full force to that now before the court. In regard to the first bill, there was no new credit given by any acceptance, and the holder was in possession of it before the time it was paid or acknowledged. So that there is no pretense to allege that there is any legal distinction between the case of a holder before or after the accepted. Both were treated in this judgment as being in the same predicament, and entitled to the same equities. The case of Neal v. Price 350] *has never since been departed from; and, in all the subsequent decisions in which it has been cited, it has had the uniform support of the court, and has been deemed a satisfactory authority. The case of Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. Rep. 76, was a stronger application of the principle. There, the acceptance was a forgery, and it purported to be payable at the plaintiff's, who was a banker, and paid it, at maturity, to the agent of the defendant, who paid in account with the defendant. A week afterwards the forgery was discovered, and due notice given to the defendant. But the court (Mr. Justice Chambre dissenting) decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Two of the judges proceeded upon the ground that the banker was bound to know the handwriting of his customers; and that there was a want of caution and negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The Chief Justice, without dissenting from this ground, put it upon the narrower ground, that during the whole week the bill must be considered as paid, and if the defendant were now compelled to pay the money back, he could not recover against the prior indorsers; so that he would sustain the whole loss from the negligence of the plaintiff. The very case occurred in The Gloucester Bank v. The Salem Bank, 17 Mass. Rep. 33, where forged notes of the latter had been paid to the former, and, upon a subsequent discovery, the amount was sought to be recovered back. The authorities were there elaborately reviewed, both by the counsel and the court, and the conclusion to *which [*351 the latter arrived was, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, upon the ground, that by receiving and paying the notes, the plaintiffs adopted them as their own; that they were bound to examine them when offered for payment, and if they neglected to do it within a reasonable time, they could not afterwards recover from the defendants a loss occasioned by their own negligence. In that case, no notice was given of the doubtful character of the notes until fifteen days after the receipt, and no actual averments of forgery until about fifty days. The notes were in a bundle when received, which had not been examined by the cashier until after a considerable time had elapsed. Much of the language of the court, as to negligence, is to be referred to this circumstance. The court said, "the true rule is, that the party receiving such notes must examine them as soon as he has opportunity, and return them immediately. If he does not, he is negligent, and negligence will defeat his right of action. This principle will apply in all cases where forged notes have been received, but certainly with more strength when the party receiving them is the one purporting to be bound to pay. For he knows better than any other whether they are his notes or not; and if he pays them, or receives them in payment, and continues silent after he has had sufficient opportunity to examine them, he should be considered as having adopted them as his own."

Against the pressure of these authorities there is not a single opposing case; and we must *therefore conclude, that both [*352 in England and America, the question has been supposed to be at rest. The case of Jones v. Ryde, 5 Taunt. Rep. 488, is clearly distinguishable; as it ranged itself within the class of cases, where forged securities of third persons had been received in payment. Bruce v. Bruce, 5 Taunt. Rep. 495, is very shortly and obscurely reported; but from what is there mentioned, as well as from the notice taken of it by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. Rep. 77, it must have turned on the same distinction as Jones v. Ryde, and was not governed by Price v. Neal.

But if the present case is to be considered, as the defendant's counsel is most solicitous to consider it, not as a case where the notes have been paid, but as a case of credit, as cash, upon the receipt of them, it will not help the argument. In that point of view, the notes must be deemed to have been accepted by the defendants, as genuine notes, and payment to have been promised accordingly. Credit was given for them, as cash, by the defendants, for nineteen days, and, during all this period, no right could exist in the plaintiffs to recover the amount against any other person, from whom they were received. By such delay, according to the doctrine of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. Rep. 76, the prior holders would be discharged; and the case of The Gloucester Bank v. The Salem Bank, 17 Mass. Rep. 33, adopts the same principle; so that there would be a loss produced by the 353*] negligence of the defendants, *but, waiving this narrower view, we think the case may be justly placed upon the broad ground that there was an acceptance of the notes as genuine, and that it falls directly within the authorities which govern the cases of acceptances of forged drafts. If there be any difference between them, the principle is stronger here than there; for there, the acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's signature. Here, a fortiori, the maker must be presumed, and is bound to know his own notes. He cannot be heard to aver his ignorance; and when he receives notes, purporting to be his own, without objection, it is an adoption of them as his own.

The general question, as to the effect of acceptances, has repeatedly come under the consideration of the courts of common law. In the early case of Wilkinson v. Luteridge, 1 Str. 648, the Lord Chief Justice considered that the acceptance of the bill was, in an action against the acceptor, a sufficient proof of the handwriting of the drawer; but it was not conclusive. In the subsequent case of Jenys v. Faucler, 2 Str. 946, the Lord Chief Justice would not suffer the acceptor to give the evidence of witnesses, that they did not believe in the drawer's handwriting, from the danger to negotiable notes; and he strongly inclined to think that actual forgery would be no defense, because the acceptance had given the bill a credit to the indorsee. Subsequent to this was the case of Price v. Neal, already commented on, in which it was thought that the acceptor ought to be 354*] conclusively bound *by his acceptance. The correctness of this doctrine was recognized by Mr. Justice Buller in Smith v. Chester, 1 D. & E. 655; by Lord Kenyon, in Barber v. Gingell, 3 Esp. Rep. 60, where he extended it to an implied acceptance; and by Mr. Justice Dampier, in Bass v. Cline, 4 M. & Selw. 15; and it was acted upon by necessary implication by the court, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. Rep. 76. In Levy v. The Bank of the United States, 1 Binn. 27, already referred to, where a forged check, drawn upon the bank, had been accepted by the latter, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff, and on the refusal of the bank afterwards to pay the amount, the suit was brought, the court expressly held the plaintiff entitled to recover, upon the ground that the acceptance concluded the defendant. The case was very strong, for the fraud was discovered a few hours only after the receipt of the check, and immediate notice given. But this was not thought in the slightest degree to vary the legal result. "Some of the cases," said the court, "decide that the acceptor is bound, because the acceptance gives a credit to the bill, etc. But the modern cases certainly notice another reason for his liability, which we think has much good sense in it, namely, that the acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's handwriting, and by his acceptance to take this knowledge upon himself." After some research, we have not been able to find a single case in which the general doctrine, thus asserted, has been shaken, *or even doubted; and the diligence [*355 of the counsel for the defendants, on the present occasion, has not been more successful than our own. Considering, then, as we do, that the doctrine is well established, that the acceptor is bound to know the handwriting of the drawer, and cannot defend himself from payment by a subsequent discovery of the forgery, we are of opinion that the present case falls directly within the same principle. We think the defendants were bound to know their own notes, and having once accepted the notes in question as their own, they are concluded by their acts of adoption, and cannot be permitted to set up the defense of forgery against the plaintiffs.

It is not thought necessary to go into a consideration of other cases cited at the bar, to establish that the acceptor may show that the accepted bill was void in its origin, as made in violation of the stamp act, etc.; for all these cases admit the genuineness of the notes, and turn upon questions of another nature, of public policy, and a violation of the laws of the land. Nor are the cases applicable, in which bills have been altered after they were drawn, or of forged indorsements, for these are not facts which an acceptor is presumed to know. Nor is it deemed material to consider in what cases receipts and stated accounts may be opened for surcharge and falsification. They depend upon other principles of general application. It is sufficient for us to declare that we place our judgment in the present case upon the ground that the defendants were bound to know their *own notes, and having received them [*356 without objection, they cannot now recall their assent. We think this doctrine founded on public policy and convenience; and that actual loss is not necessary to be proved, for potential loss may exist, and the law will always presume a possible loss in cases of this nature.

The remaining consideration is, whether there has been a legal waiver of the rights of the plaintiffs derived under the cash deposit, or, in other words, whether they have consented to treat it as a nullity. There is nothing on which to rest such a defense, unless it is to be inferred from the letter of Mr. Early, the cashier of the Bank of the United States, under date of the 17th of March, 1819, addressed to the cashier of the Bank of Huntsville. That letter contains information of the forgery of the notes, and then proceeds, "by the person which we shall in a few days send to your place, as heretofore intimated, we will forward these altered bills for the purpose of getting you to exchange them for other money." Now, there is no evidence that this letter was ever shown to the Bank of Georgia, or its contents ever brought to the cognizance of its officers. It states no agreement to take back the notes, or to transmit them, on account of the Bank of the United States, to Huntsville. For aught that appears, the intention may have been to transmit them on account of the Bank of Georgia, under the expectation that the latter might desire it. But what is almost conclusive on this point is, that on the same day the Bank of Georgia had made 357*] *a tender of the notes to the plaintiffs, which had been refused. This is wholly inconsistent with the notion that they had agreed to take them back, or to treat the previous credit as a nullity. Assuming, therefore, that the cashier had a general or special authority for the purpose of extinguishing the rights of the plaintiffs, growing out of the prior transactions (which is not established in proof), it is sufficient to say that it is not shown that he exercised such an authority. And the case of Levy v. The Bank of the United States affords a very strong argument, that a waiver, without some new consideration, upon a sudden disclosure, and under a mistake of legal rights, ought not to be conclusive to the prejudice of the party, where, upon farther reflection, he refuses to acquiesce in it. The subsequent letter of the 25th of March, demonstrates that the intention of waiving the rights of the bank, if ever entertained, had been at that time entirely abandoned.

The letter from the Huntsville Bank, of the 4th of May, cannot vary the legal result. What might be the rights of the plaintiffs against that bank, in case of an unsuccessful issue of the present cause, it is unnecessary to determine. The contract, whatever it may be, is res inter alios acta, from which the defendants cannot, and ought not to derive any advantage.

It only remains to add, that if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the principal, they are entitled to interest from the time of instituting the suit.

358*] *Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court, that the Circuit Court erred in refusing the first and third instructions prayed for by the plaintiffs; and for these errors the judgment must be reversed, with directions to award a venire facias de novo. On the second instruction asked by the plaintiffs, it is unnecessary to express any opinion.

KEPLINGER v. DE YOUNG.

A, having obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement, to wit, a machine for making watch chains, brought an action, under the 3d section of the patent act of 1800, c. 179 (XXVI.), for a violation of his patent-right against B; and on the trial, an agreement was proved, made by the defendant with C, to purchase of him all the watch chains, not exceeding five gross a week, which he might be able to manufacture within six months, and an agreement on the part of C to devote his whole time and attention to the manufacture of the watch chains, and not to sell or dispose of any of them, so as to interfere with the exclusive privilege secured to the defendant of purchasing the whole quantity which it might be practicable for C to make. And it was proved that the machine used by C with the knowledge and consent of the defendant in the manufacture, was the same with that invented by the plaintiff, and that all the watch chains this made by C were delivered to the defendant according to the contract. Held, that if the contract was real and not colorable, and if the defendant had no other connection with C than that which grew out of the contract, it did not amount to a breach of the plaintiff's patent-right.

*Such a contract, connected with evidence [*359 from which the jury might legally infer, either that the machine which was to be employed in the manufacture of the patented article was owned wholly or in part by the defendant, or that it was hired to the defendant for six months, under color of a sale of the articles to be manufactured with it, and with intent to invade the plaintiff's patent-right, would amount to a breach of his right.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This cause was argued by Mr. Webster and Mr. Sergeant for the plaintiff, and by the Attorney-General for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit commenced by the plaintiff, Keplinger, in the fourth circuit for the district of Maryland, against the defendant, for the violation of the plaintiff's patent-right, secured to him according to law, in a certain new and useful improvement, to wit, a machine for making watch chains, etc. The third count in the declaration, upon which alone this cause has been argued, is in the usual form, charging the defendant with having unlawfully used the said improvement, without the consent of the plaintiff first had and obtained in writing. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave notice to the plaintiff that he should deny that the exclusive right of using the improvement mentioned in the declaration, was vested in the plaintiff, or that he was the original and first inventor of the said improvement, and that he should give evidence to establish those facts.

*At the trial, the plaintiff read in [*360 evidence the letters patent duly granted, bearing date the 4th of May, 1820, and proved that he was the true and original inventor of the machine specified in the patent, and that the defendant, together with John Hatch and John C. Kirkner, did use the said machine in the making of watch chains from steel, from the 4th of May till some time in the month of December, 1820.

The defendant, in order to prove that any concern or connection which he had with the said Hatch & Kirkner, in the making of watch chains, by means of the said machine, was merely as a purchaser of watch chains from them under the following contract, produced and gave the same in evidence. The agreement referred to, bearing date the 3d of May, 1820, is between M. De Young, and J. Hatch and J.

Kirkner, and witnesses, "that the said Hatch & Kirkner do hereby engage and obligate themselves to manufacture and deliver to M. De Young, or at his store in said city, not less than three gross, but as many as five gross, of wire watch chains, agreeably to a sample to be deposited by T. Barly (if practicable to manufacture so many), in each week, from the date hereof, for the term of six months, one-half of which number to be with turned slides, and the other half wire slides; the whole number to be four strands, if the said De Young so choose; but he is to have the privilege of directing the description to be furnished, that is to say, what number of four, five, six or eight strands; the prices of which 361*] *to be as follows: four strands, two dollars per dozen; six strands, two dollars sixty-six and two-third cents per dozen, and eight strands at the rate of three dollars thirty-three cents per dozen; said Hatch & Kirkner to devote their whole time and attention to said manufactory, and neither to sell, barter nor dispose of, in any manner, or way, or means whatever, of any goods of the description hereinbefore described, or which may, in any manner or way whatsoever, interfere with the exclusive privilege hereinbefore granted, but will faithfully manufacture for said De Young, and none other, as far as five gross of chains per week, if practicable, and not less than three gross per week, at the prices hereinbefore stipulated, and payable as follows: one-half in cash at the end of every week, for the total number delivered within the week, and the other half in said De Young's promissory note, payable at sixty days from the date thereof. And the said De Young, on his part, doth hereby promise to receive from the said Hatch & Kirkner, such quantity of watch chains answering the description of the sample, as it may be in their power to manufacture, not exceeding five gross per week, reserving to himself the privilege of directing what proportion thereof shall be four, six or eight strands, and pay for the same weekly in the following manner, viz., the one-half amount of week's delivery in cash, the other half in a note at sixty days, the same to be settled for weekly, in manner aforesaid, if required."

The defendant also gave evidence to prove 362*] *that all the connection he ever had with the said Hatch & Kirkner, relative to watch chains made by them with the said machine, or otherwise, was merely as a purchaser of such chains from them, under and in pursuance of the said contract.

The plaintiff then proved that, at the time of making the said contract, the defendant was fully apprized of the existence of the machine described and specified in the patent, and of its prior and original invention by the plaintiff, and of the intention of the plaintiff to obtain the said patent; and that the said contract was made with a view to the employment by the said Hatch & Kirkner, in the manufacture of watch chains, of a machine precisely similar to that invented by the plaintiff, after the plaintiff should have obtained his patent; and that a machine precisely similar to that invented by the plaintiff was employed by the said Hatch & Kirkner in the manufacture of watch chains by them under the said contract, and with the knowledge and consent of the defendant during the whole period aforesaid, he and they having received notice, on the 5th of May, 1820, of the plaintiff's patent; and that the watch chains so manufactured by Hatch & Kirkner, during the whole of the said period, were delivered by them to the defendant, and by him received, under and in conformity with the said contract.

Upon this evidence, the court, at the request of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict on the first and second counts in his declaration, *because the acts which they [*363 charge, if true, constitute no offense against the plaintiff's patent. And that, if the jury should be of opinion, on the evidence, that the plaintiff is the sole and original inventor of the whole machine; and that the defendant had no other connection with Hatch & Kirkner with regard to these chains, than that which arose from his said contract with them, under which he procured the chains to be made by Hatch & Kirkner, and sold them when so made; and that the said contract is a real contract; then these acts constituted no breach of the plaintiff's patent-right on the part of De Young, and that the verdict must be for the defendant; and that this legal aspect would not be changed, although the defendant may, on any occasion, have supplied, at the cost of Hatch & Kirkner, the wire from which the chains so manufactured were made.

To this instruction the plaintiff's counsel took a bill of exceptions, and a verdict and judgment having been rendered for the defendant, the cause is brought into this court by a writ of error.

The only question which is presented by the bill of exceptions to the consideration of this court is, whether the court below erred in the instruction given to the jury; and this must depend upon the correct construction of the 3d section of the act of Congress, of the 17th of April, 1800, c. 179, which enacts, "that where any patent shall be granted, pursuant to *the act of the 21st February, 1793, c. [*364 156, and any person without the consent of the patentee his executors, etc., first obtained in writing, shall make, devise, use or sell, the thing whereof the exclusive right is secured to the said patentee by such patent, such person so offending shall forfeit and pay to the said patentee, a sum equal to three times the actual damage sustained by such patentee," etc.

The contract, taken in connection with the whole of the evidence stated in the bill of exceptions, if the same were believed by the jury, formed most certainly a strong case against the defendant, sufficient to have warranted the jury in inferring, either that the machine which was to be employed in the manufacture of the watch chains was owned in whole or in part by the defendant, or that it was hired to the defendant for six months, under color of a sale of the articles which might be manufactured with it, and with intent to invade the plaintiff's patent-right. Whether the contract, taken in connection with the whole of the evidence, does or does not amount to a hiring by the defendant of the machine, or the use of it for six months, is a point which is not to be considered as being decided either way by the court. The bill of exceptions does not call for an opinion upon it.

But the contract, taken by itself, amounted to no more than an agreement by the defendant to purchase, at a fixed price, all the watch chains, not exceeding five gross a week, which 365*] Hatch *& Kirkner might be able to manufacture in the course of six months, with any machine they might choose to employ; and an agreement on the part of Hatch & Kirkner, to devote their whole time and attention to the manufacture of the chains, and not to sell or dispose of any of them, so as to interfere with the exclusive privilege secured to the defendant of purchasing the whole quantity which it might be practicable for them to make.

If this contract was real, and not colorable, which is the obvious meaning of the instruction, and the defendant had no other connection with Hatch & Kirkner in regard to these chains that what grew out of it, it would, in the opinion of the court, be an extravagant construction of the patent law to pronounce that it amounted to a breach of the plaintiff's patent-right, by fixing upon the defendant the charge of having used the plaintiff's machine. Such a construction would be highly inconvenient and unjust to the rest of the community, since it might subject any man who might innocently contract with a manufacturer to purchase all the articles which he might be able to make within a limited period, to the heavy penalty inflicted by the act, although he might have been ignorant of the plaintiff's patent, or that a violation of it would be the necessary consequence of the contract. It might possibly extend further, and affect contracts express or implied, though of a more limited character, but equally innocent, as to which, however, it is not the intention of the court to express 366*] *any opinion, as this case does not call for it.

This cause was argued by the plaintiff's counsel as if the opinion of the court below had been given upon the whole of the evidence. But this was not the case. No instruction was asked for but by the defendant's counsel, and that was confined to a single part of the case, the connection between the defendant and Hatch & Kirkner, in regard to the watch chains which the latter bound themselves, by their contract, to manufacture and deliver to the former. If the jury had been of opinion, upon the whole of the evidence, that the contract was not a real one, or that that instrument did not constitute the sole connection between those parties, or that the transaction was merely colorable, with a view to evade the law, the jury were not precluded by the instruction from considering the plaintiff's patent-right as violated, and finding a verdict accordingly.

Had the plaintiff's counsel thought proper to call upon the court for an opinion and instruction to the jury, upon any points arising out of the whole, or any part of the evidence, it would have been their duty to give an opinion upon such points, leaving the conclusion of fact from the evidence to be drawn by the jury. But this course not having been pursued, this court can take no notice of the evidence, although spread upon the record, except so far as it is connected with the single point upon which the opinion which is excepted to was given. As to the residue of that opinion, that "the legal aspect of the *case would [*367 not be changed, although the defendant might, on any occasion, have supplied, at the cost of Hatch & Kirkner, the wire from which the chains so manufactured were made," it is quite as free from objection as the preceding part of it, since it stands upon precisely the same principle.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

v.

J. JOHNSON, R. M. Johnson, W. T. Barry and J. Prentiss.

In a contract for the loan of money, the law of the place where the contract is made is to govern; and it is immaterial that the loan was to be secured by a mortgage on lands in another state.

In such a case, the statutes of usury of the state where the contract was made, and not those of the state where it is secured by mortgage, are to govern it, unless there be some other circumstance to show that the parties had in view the laws of the latter state.

Although a contract be usurious in its inception, a subsequent agreement to free it from the taint of usury will render it valid.

The purchaser of an equity of redemption cannot set up usury as a defense to a bill brought by the mortgagee for a foreclosure, especially if the mortgageor has himself waived the defense.

Under a usury law which does not avoid the securities, but only forbids the taking a greater interest than six per centum per annum, a court of equity will not refuse its aid to recover the principal.

A certificated bankrupt or insolvent, against whom no relief can be had, is not a necessary party to a suit in equity; but if he be made a defendant, he cannot be examined as a witness in the cause, until an order has been obtained upon motion for that purpose.

*APPEAL from the Circuit Court [*368 of Kentucky.

This was a bill filed by the appellant, De Wolf, in the court below, on the 4th of September, 1818, for a foreclosure of a mortgage given by Prentiss, one of the respondents, on the 7th of July, 1817, to secure the repayment of the sum of $62,000. The bill alleged that the mortgageor had conveyed his equity of redemption to W. T. Barry, by a deed of trust dated the 16th of March, 1818, describing the lands as "all those tracts or parcels of land described and contained in a deed of mortgage from the said J. Prentiss to the said J. De Wolf, dated the 7th of July, 1817," "it being the intention and meaning hereof, that after the satisfaction of the debts set forth in said deeds, the remainder of the property described in said deeds," "shall be hereby conveyed." According to the provisions of the deed, Barry

The above case of De Wolf v. Johnson is relied on as authority that the purchaser of an equity of redemption cannot show usury in the mortgage to exposed the premises for sale at public auction, on the 27th of May, 1818, "subject to the encumbrances of any previous mortgage or deed of trust, particularly a mortgage deed to J. De Wolf, from J. Prentiss, dated the 7th of July, 1817," "recorded in the clerk's office of the Fayette County Court, and to which all persons wishing to purchase are referred for more particular information." At this sale, the property was purchased by J. Johnson and R. M. Johnson. Prentiss filed no answer to the bill, and it was taken pro confesso against him. J. Johnson answered, claiming as a bonæ fidei purchaser for a valuable consideration, and [*369] setting up the defense of *usury in the contract between Prentiss and the appellant, De Wolf, and also denying notice of the mortgage except by vague report, which report was accompanied with the suggestion that the mortgage was void, as being affected with usury. Barry also answered, admitting the conveyance to himself by Prentiss, in trust to sell, which sale he had effected publicly, and in good faith, before the bill filed; and in pursuance of the sale had conveyed to the defendants, J. & R. M. Johnson; and alleged that he was ignorant of the claim of the plaintiff, De Wolf, except so far as that claim was recognized in the deed of trust; and also set up the defense of usury between the mortgageor and mortgagee. The other defendant, R. M. Johnson, answered, recognizing and adopting the answer of J. Johnson, and denying for himself all knowledge of the mortgage at the date of the conveyance to Barry. He also averred that he was a creditor of Prentiss to the amount of nearly $500,000, for which he had no other security than the assignment to Barry, through which he derived title to the mortgaged premises. The cause went to hearing on the pleadings and proofs, and Prentiss was admitted as a witness on the part of the other defendants, subject to legal exceptions; but it did not appear by the transcript of the record, whether the decree of the court below was grounded upon his testimony. It appeared by the other evidence in the cause, that the transaction originated in a loan made by De Wolf to Prentiss, in the state Rhode Island, *in the year 1815, the [*370] repayment of which was secured by a mortgage upon the lands in Kentucky, which contract was afterwards waived by the parties, and a new contract entered into by them in the state of Kentucky, in the year 1817. The principal question of fact was, whether either, or both of those contracts, was void, under the usury laws of either of those states, and as this question is fully considered in the opinion of this court, it has not been thought necessary to extract from the voluminous mass of testimony in the court below, the general result of the evidence as bearing upon it.

On the part of the appellants, it was contended:

1. That the original contract of 1815, if usurious, was not void according to the laws by which it ought to be governed; the laws of Rhode Island not avoiding the contract, or the securities given for it, but only forfeiting one-third of the principal, and all the interest of the loan, as a penalty to be recovered by information or action of debt.

2. That the contract of 1817 was free from the taint of usury.

3. That if either, or both those contracts, were usurious, the defendants, J. & R. M. Johnson, could not take advantage of the usury, not only because they were not parties to the contract, but because, by the very terms of the deed of trust to Barry, under which they claim, they *took the estate in controversy sub- [*371] ject to the prior conveyance to the appellant.

On the part of the respondents, it was insisted:

1. That the loan of 1815 was usurious and void.

2. That the transaction of 1817 was a device to secure the repayment of money advanced on an usurious agreement.

3. That money advanced on an usurious agreement cannot be secured, and the payment enforced in a court of equity, at the instance of the lender, by force of any after agreement of the lender to relinquish the usury, and of the borrower to repay the money lent.[1]

1.—The act of Rhode Island of 1798, after prohibiting (s. 1) the contracting for more than six per centum per annum for the loan of money, wares, goods, etc., provides (s. 5) "that a sum equal to one-third part of the principal, and all the interest of every bond, mortgage, specialty, agreement, contract, promise or assurance whatsoever, which shall be made after the passing of this act, for the payment of money, goods, wares or other commodities to be lent on usury, wherein or whereby there shall be received, agreed for, or taken, for the forbearance or giving day of payment above the rate of interest expressed in the first section of this act, shall be forfeited by the creditor, one half of such forfeiture for the use of the state, and the other half for the use of him, her or them who will prosecute for the same. That the said forfeiture shall and may be recovered by information or action of debt, before any court proper to try the same; that in the trial of every such information or action, the borrower or hirer of the money, goods, wares or other commodities, on such usurious contract, shall be admitted a legal witness, if not interested in the event of such prosecution; provided, nevertheless, that all informations and actions for the recovery of such forfeiture shall be brought and commenced within one year after such forfeiture shall have accrued. Provided further, that nothing in this act shall extend to the letting of cattle, or other usages of the like nature in practice amongst farmers, or maritime contracts amongst merchants, as bottomry, insurance, or course of exchange, as hath been heretofore accustomed."

The act of Kentucky of 1798 prohibits the taking above the rate of six per centum per annum as the interest for the loan of money, wares or merchandise, and declares that "all bonds, contracts, covenants, conveyances or assurances, hereafter to be made for any money or goods so to be lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken than is hereby allowed, shall be utterly void."

defeat a foreclosure in Port v. The Bank of Utica, 7 Hill. 391, 406; and it was followed on this point in Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y. 2 Seld. 347, 352.

In Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet. 205, 229, 230, the judge who delivered the opinion says that in the above case of De Wolf v. Johnson, the question whether the purchaser of the equity of redemption can show usury in the mortgage to defeat a foreclosure was not involved. But in Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y., 352, the judge delivering the opinion says: "I have carefully examined that case and I cannot arrive at that conclusion."

In Lloyd v. Scott it is held, that a purchaser may set up the usury in a loan by way of annuity, charged on real property.

As to usury, see also the following cases: Nichols v. Fearson, 7 Pet. 103; Gather v. Farm. Bk. 1 Pet. 43, 44; Thornton v. Bk. of Wash. 3 Pet. 40; Bk. of U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet. 327.

372*] Mr. Jones and Mr. P. Hall, for the appellant, argued that contracts being to be governed by the laws of the country where they are made, as to their nature, construction and effect, the original contract of 1815 was not within the statute of Kentucky as to usury.[1] The rate of interest is governed by the law of the country where the debt was contracted, and not according to that where the action is brought.[2] That if there be no express reference to any other place, the law will intend that the contract was to be executed where it was made, and have a reference to the law of that state. Nor would taking a security upon lands in another country vary the application of the rule. Thus, contracts made in England, secured by mortgage on estates in the West Indies, are construed by the English law.[3] So, 373] where the debt was contracted in Ireland, and the security given in England, it was held that Irish interest should be allowed.[4] If the contract be not void by the laws of the country where it was made, it can never become so by being carried into another country to be enforced; if valid in the country where it was made, it will be valid everywhere, unless some reason of policy oppose its execution.[5] Usury is only malum prohibitum, and independent of statutory regulation, the parties may contract for whatever rate of interest they please.[6] Unless the statute of usury which applies to the case avoids the contract, the defendant cannot avail himself of this ground of defense. Penal laws are strictly local, and the statute of Rhode Island is merely a penal law.[7] The respondents, seeking to avail themselves of usury in a contract made in that state, must show that it would be a good defense there.[8] If the contract of 1815 were good under the law by which it ought to be governed, it would not be invalidated by the subsequent contract, even if that were void.[9] But the contract of 1817 was, in fact, free from usury, and would have the effect of purifying the previous contract 374] *from all taint.[10] Where usurious securities have been destroyed by mutual consent, a promise by the borrower to repay the principal and legal interest is binding.[11] As to the sale of stock, if it was fair and bona fide, and not with a view to evade the statute, it would not invalidate the contract.[12] As to the amount advanced in treasury notes, they are to be put on a footing with bank notes, and if received in payment, are to be considered as cash.[13] A tender in bank notes, if not objected to, is good.[14] The sum paid as rent is not usurious, unless paid in consequence of a previous corrupt agreement.[15] A payment in the nature of a penalty is not usurious.[16] If there be any usury at all in the new contract of 1817, it has crept in by mistake and miscalculation, and that will not avoid it.[17] The testimony of Prentiss to prove the alleged usury is inadmissible, because he is a party upon the record, is liable for costs, is directly interested in the event of the *suit, and is concluded by [*375 the decree.[18] And finally, even if usury exist, and be ever so clearly proved, the defendants, J. & R. M. Johnson, cannot take advantage of it, since they purchased, subject to De Wolf's mortgage, which, if usurious, is not to be taken as absolutely void.[19]

Mr. Webster and Mr. Bibb, contra, admitted the general rule as to the lex loci contractus, but contended that the present contract was made with a view to the laws of Kentucky, where the borrower was domiciled, where the security was given, and where the money was to be repaid. It was an exception to the rule, that where the contract was made in one country with a view to the laws of another, the statutes of the latter were to govern it.[20] This was founded upon the same reason with the rule itself, i. e., the intention of the parties. Another exception is, where the parties go from one country into another, and there make a contract with a view to evade the laws of the former. So, if it be against the public policy of the country where performance of the contract is sought, to enforce it, the rule *does not apply.[21] But it was insisted [*376 that by the law of Rhode Island, where the original agreement was made, it was absolutely void; and, as such, could not be enforced in any other state or country. But the statute of Kentucky, which was the law properly applicable to the case, not only prohibited the usurious contract, but absolutely avoided the securities. It was well settled, that any device, however specious, by which illegal interest is reserved, would render the contract void.[1] Even a beneficial purchase by the lender, or disadvantageous purchase by the borrower, will be considered within the statutes of usury, if connected with a loan, or treaty, or communication for a loan.[2] So a sale of goods, or stock, as a contrivance to evade the usury laws, avoids the contract.[3] And if the lender, in part of his advance, give a bill or note, payable at a future day, and charges interest from the date of the contract, it is usurious.[4] A contract, void upon the ground of usury, cannot be made good by [*377] a subsequent new agreement, *and if void in part, it is void in toto.[5] If the lender of money, on an usurious contract, seeks to enforce his securities in a court of equity, the securities will be declared void, and ordered to be delivered up; and in this respect, the rule is different where the borrower himself applies to the court for relief, in which latter case he must pay, or offer to pay, the principal and interest lawfully due, before he is entitled to relief.[6] But it is sufficient if a contract be prohibited by positive law for a court of equity to refuse its aid in enforcing it, whether the securities given be expressly declared void or not. The other defendants, claming to stand in the place of Prentiss, as his assignees and creditors, have a clear legal and equitable right to take advantage of the illegality of the contract made with him, and which was attempted to be secured by a mortgage upon his property.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause has been discussed very much at large, and with a degree of talent, candor, and research, very satisfactory to the court. In proceeding to consider it, however, we think it advisable to deviate from the order in which the points were examined at the bar, and to pursue them as they arise in the progress of the suit.

In the year 1818, the complainant filed his [*378] bill in *the Circuit Court of the United States for Kentucky, to obtain a foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the sum of sixty-two thousand dollars, and bearing date July 7, 1817. The debt secured was payable by instalments, only one of which was due when the bill was filed, but in the progress of the cause all the instalments falling due, they were all, by consent, admitted into the pleadings, as if introduced by supplemental bill.

The bill first sets out the mortgage and the breach, and then proceeds to allege that Prentiss, the mortgageor, had conveyed his equity of redemption to W. J. Barry, who had sold to James Johnson and R. M. Johnson, the two latter of whom were then in possession.

Prentiss files no answer, and in due course the bill, as to him, is ordered to be taken pro confesso. James Johnson files an answer, claiming as bona fide purchased for a valuable consideration, and setting up the defense of usury in the contract between Prentiss and the complainant, and putting the complainant generally upon his proof. He also denies notice of De Wolf's mortgage, otherwise than by vague report, which report, he alleges, was accompanied with the suggestion that the mortgage to De Wolf was affected with usury, and void.

At a subsequent day, Barry also answers, admitting the conveyance to himself by Prentiss, in trust to sell, which sale, he alleges, he had effected publicly, and in good faith, before the bill was filed; and in pursuance of such sale, had conveyed *to the Johnsons. He [*379 further alleges that at the time of the execution of the deed of trust to him, "he was ignorant of the complainant's claim, except so far as that claim is recognized in the deed of trust," and also sets up the usury between the mortgageor and mortgagee, in avoidance of the mortgage.

R. M. Johnson also files an answer, in which he recognizes and adopts the answer of James Johnson, and further denies, altogether, knowledge of the mortgage to De Wolf at the date of the transfer to Barry. He then sets out that he is a creditor of Prentiss to the amount of near $500,000, for which he has no other security than the assignment to Barry, through which he derives title to the mortgaged premises.

Upon this state of the pleadings, with a few formal and immaterial additions, the parties went into their proofs. And as the complainant exhibited his mortgage in legal form, and with all the evidence of authenticity required by law, it followed that the defendants were put upon their proof to maintain the grounds on which they sought to avoid it.

It was not contended that in the immediate contract on which the bill was founded, there was any usurious taint belonging to that transaction itself. The ground taken was usury in a transaction anterior by two years, out of which the mortgage in question drew its origin, and from which the usurious taint was supposed to be transmitted either directly or incidentally. The case proposed to be established in proof *was, that in the year 1815 there [*380 was a negotiation for a loan between these parties, the scene of which was in Bristol, Rhode Island. That the sum to be loaned was $83,000, but which sum in fact was reduced below $80,000, by means which they contended were resorted to for the purpose of disguising the usurious interest, to be retained by way of premium, or bonus, or imposition. That the interest actually stipulated for was twelve per cent., of which six per cent. was reserved in a bond executed at the time for $111,000, comprising compound interest, there being no annual interest reserved. The other six per cent. was secured under the aspect of a rent payable out of lands in Kentucky, for which Prentiss executed absolute conveyances, and De Wolf stipulated to reconvey on the payment of the amount for which Prentiss gave his bond, and a sum annually, by way of rent, equal to six per cent. upon the $83,000, that is, the sum of $4,980.

This rent, it seems, was paid the first year, together with an additional sum of $498, added as interest and damages.

And a bill for the sum of $4,980 was drawn the second year by De Wolf upon Prentiss, payable in Philadelphia, but this was returned under protest, and subsequently taken up by a bill for $5,154, indorsed by J. T. Meder, Jun.

The evasion of the statute against usury, supposed to have been practiced upon Prentiss in making up the sum of $83,000, had relation to three items. The first, a sum of about $32,-381*] 000, *admitted into the computation as the price set upon fifteen shares of the Lexington Manufacturing Establishment, transferred by De Wolf to Prentiss. The second, treasury notes to the amount of $20,211.94, received at par; and the third, $30,802.73, bills drawn upon Philadelphia also taken at par. Upon these three items there was an estimated loss sustained of about $3,400.

The contract of 1815 was unquestionably entered into in the state of Rhode Island, and was there reduced to writing; but had a view to Kentucky for its consummation. As it entered into the contract that Prentiss should secure De Wolf by a conveyance of Kentucky land to a large amount, two agents were employed and intrusted by De Wolf, with the securities to be passed to Prentiss, and a power to draw upon him for the money, to be paid in Philadelphia; which Prentiss was to have the benefit of, upon complying with the articles of his contract, purporting an absolute conveyance of the land. The place where the contract of repayment of the principal on the part of Prentiss was to be fulfilled, appears no farther than this, that the bond is given to pay generally, without regard to place, and the money to be paid by way of rent, appears by the subsequent acts of the parties respecting the bills drawn for the rent, to have been payable in Philadelphia.

The contract of 1817, in which this mortgage originated, was executed in Kentucky, and had its inception in an intimation from Prentiss of 382*] a *design to avail himself of the plea of usury. Upon this, De Wolf repaired to Kentucky, and there instituted a new negotiation with Prentiss personally, having for its object to clear the contract from all usurious incidents, and to take security for the sum loaned, at the legal interest of Kentucky, which, as well as that of Rhode Island, is six per cent. Accordingly, all the instruments of writing which appertained to the old contract were surrendered mutually, and a new mortgage given to secure the balance now sued for; the original sum having been reduced by large actual payments to the sum for which this mortgage was given, and which includes the same premises conveyed under the prior contract.

The defense set up rests upon the assumption that the new contract was not purged of the usury; or, rather, that the whole contract of 1815 was void, and could, therefore, form no basis or consideration for the contract of 1817. Or if not wholly void, it comprised several items of an usurious character, which ought to be included in the new contract. And here two preliminary questions arose, the first of which was, whether the lex loci of the contract of 1815 was Rhode Island or Kentucky. By the usury laws of the latter, the contract, and all the securities given for it, are void, both for principal and interest. By the laws of the former, although it is prohibited to take more than six per cent. interest, and a penalty imposed for the offense, the act does not render the contract void, certainly not for the principal sum. By the laws of Kentucky, *it [*383 is supposed that the principal debt being abolished, there could be no consideration to sustain the new contract; by the laws of Rhode Island, that the reverse would be the effect, unless, as was contended in argument, that the simple prohibition of such a contract, which is express in the Rhode Island act, would affect it with the character of an illegal contract, and, as such, one which a court of equity would not lend its aid to carry into effect.

With regard to the locality of the contract of 1815, we have no doubt that it must be governed by the law of Rhode Island. The proof is positive that it was entered into there, and there is nothing that can arise a question but the circumstance of its making a part of the contract, that it should be secured by conveyances of Kentucky land. But the point is established, that the mere taking of foreign security does not alter the locality of the contract with regard to the legal interest. Taking foreign security does not necessarily draw after it the consequence that the contract is to be fulfilled where the security is taken. The legal fulfillment of a contract of loan, on the part of the borrower, is repayment of the money, and the security given is but the means of securing what he has contracted for, which, in the eye of the law, is to pay where he borrows, unless another place of payment be expressly designated by the contract. No tender would have been effectual to discharge the mortgagee, unless made in Rhode Island. On a bill to redeem, a court of equity would not have listened to the idea of *calling the mortgagee to [*384 Kentucky in order to receive a tender.

In the effort to sustain his defense under the laws of Rhode Island, the defendants have introduced into the cause the examination of their co-defendant, Prentiss, taken at the instance of themselves, and received in the court below subject to legal exceptions. We are not informed whether the court below actually recognized it as competent evidence, since the grounds on which that court dismissed the bill are not spread upon the record. It is enough that it does not appear to be rejected; we are now called upon to pass an opinion upon it.

The only grounds upon which an argument has been made in support of the admissibility of Prentiss' deposition, have been, that the complainant avers him to be insolvent, which fact the testimony in the cause goes also far to establish; and that his deposition was taken before he was in reality made a party by the service of a supœna. But on no principle can his evidence be adjudged competent. It is true, that cases occur in which certificated bankrupts are struck out of a record and made witnesses; but if this was a case in which a motion to strike out could have been sustained, the motion should have been made, and the party's name expunged from the record. On no principle could he be made a witness while he was himself a party. He may have had little or no interest in the event of the suit, except as to the costs; but still, while a party to the record, he could not be examined. We 385*] know of no exception to this rule, whatever be the court in which the question occurs, except it be in the administration of certain branches of the admiralty jurisdiction. From the views that we take of the case, however, we do not find it necessary to inquire whether there is sufficient evidence in the cause, after rejecting the evidence of Prentiss, to sustain the facts on which the defense rests. If, with the aid of that testimony, the defense cannot be sustained, a fortiori, it cannot be without it. And here it may be proper to premise, as was very correctly remarked in the argument, that there has not been, in fact, any contrariety of opinion expressed by the counsel on the law of usury. Usury is a mortal taint wherever it exists, and no subterfuge shall be permitted to conceal it from the eye of the law; this is the substance of all the cases, and they only vary as they follow the detours through which they have had to pursue the money-lender. But one difficulty presents itself here of no ordinary kind. It is not very easy to discover how the taint of Rhode Island usury can infuse itself into the veins of a Kentucky contract. The defense would not admit of a moment's reflection if it rested on the direct effects which laws against usury have upon contracts. Whatever sums may have been derived through the usurious contract of 1815, to the contract of 1817, they would not affect the latter with usury, unless introduced in violation or evasion of the laws of Kentucky, for the two contracts are governed by laws that have no connection. But it makes very little 386] difference *in this case, since, if the contract of 1817 is, either in whole or in part, unconscionable, this court would not lend its aid to execute it as far as it was unconscionable, and the argument goes to show that it partakes of that character, because, admitting that the law of Rhode Island did not render the contract of 1815 null and void for the principal sum loaned, yet the sum exhibited in that contract, as principal, and so transmitted to the latter contract, contained sundry items which, it is contended, were passed upon Prentiss at a great loss, and under circumstances calculated to serve as a disguise to usury.

And first, as to the shares in the Lexington Manufacturing Company; these were fifteen in number, and appear to have been taken by Prentiss on account of the $83,000, about $2,000 a share. The whole of which, there is reason to think, was sunk in his hands, in the general wreck of the adventure.

It cannot be denied that this is a suspicious item; it does not, in general, comport with a negotiation for a loan of money, that anything should enter into the views of the parties but money, or those substitutes which, from their approximation to money, circulate with corresponding if not equal facility. Still, however, like every other case, it is open to explanation, and the question always is, whether it was or was not a subterfuge to evade the laws against usury. And here it is to be observed, that it is not every sale which, in a negotiation for a loan, will taint the transaction with usury; for it may *comport per- [*387 fectly with the general views of the borrower to make such a purchase, or to take the article even in preference to money. I would illustrate this by the case of a merchant who proposes to borrow a capital to adventure in trade, and who, instead of money, receives an assortment, at a fair price, adapted to that trade. There would be no ground for attributing to such a transaction a design to evade the statute. But in what does the present case vary from that? Prentiss had embarked in a manufactory, of the prospects of which he entertained the highest hopes. He either believed, or endeavored to persuade others, that it would yield fifty per cent. The De Wolfs had embarked, on his representations, $30,000 in the enterprise. No experiments had been yet made from which any doubts could be excited, nor is there any proof that the stock was falling. Under these circumstances, he proposes to take back the shares if he could procure money to complete the establishment. The connection between the actual loan, and taking the shares as part of the loan, was easy and natural, and the interest of twelve per cent., with other incidental advantages held out for the loan, may well be estimated as the actual inducement, without supposing that De Wolf was conscious of passing this item upon Prentiss at an inflated price. Prentiss had himself put a value upon these shares but a short time before, in the sale to De Wolf, at nearly the same price, and De Wolf was either his dupe, or the shares were resold at their value. Prentiss' continuing *confi- [*388 dence in their value is positively deduced from the efforts he made to complete, at every hazard and sacrifice, the establishment to which those shares appertained. He still thought it a profitable investment, and so had De Wolf thought it, or he would not have made so large an investment without an atom of security but what was to be found in his anticipations from the establishment itself. It is conclusive that this was no heterogeneous disconnected article forced into the negotiation, but intimately connected with, if not the primary object of, the loan; that the price, however inflated, was that which both parties had, by previous unequivocal acts, set upon it; and if it could be said to have a market value, there is no evidence that it was above its market value; and, finally, that it was an actual transfer of interest with a view to acquire the article, and not merely to throw it upon the market in order to raise money. It was a real transaction, and not a subterfuge.

On the subject of the treasury notes and bills drawn on Philadelphia, we can perceive nothing usurious, or even unconscionable, in this part of the transaction. As to treasury notes, they were thrown into circulation as money, and it is an historical fact that they were worth all they purported to be worth, notwithstanding the casual depreciation which the embarrassments of the country, and the scarcity of gold and silver, may have produced; and as to the bills on Philadelphia, we are induced to believe that payment in that form was a benefit conferred on the borrower. *From the [389 well known course of trade between Kentucky and Philadelphia, it would scarcely have been possible, at that time, or perhaps at any time, to have suited them better in making a payment of money intended to be transported to, and used in, Kentucky. With regard to the bills, it is in evidence that there was no loss incurred; and on the treasury notes, not as much as the transportation of gold and silver would have cost, calculating all the incidents to actual transportation. But what if these payments had been made in Rhode Island bank bills? Would there have been a pretext of lurking usury in such a payment? Yet who can doubt that the payment would have been less convenient than that actually made? In all probability, with reference to gold and silver, and the exchange or depreciation in Kentucky, the paper of Rhode Island would have been equally, if not more disadvantageous. It is not on such vague and equivocal grounds that courts infer the presence of usury. But there is one consideration with reference to this part of the cause which is conclusive. There is no evidence in the record that these payments were in any way forced upon Prentiss. On the contrary, for anything that appears in the evidence, it may have been, in both instances, the payment of his own choice. In a letter not long before the loan, he actually quotes bills on Philadelphia from four to six per cent. advance. Nothing of that chaffering appears in the cause which distinguishes all the cases in which attempts are made to evade 390] usury laws, *at the moment of extorting extravagant profits on the advance of money.

With regard to the two payments made by way of rent, we have to remark that there never was any payment of interest for two years on the $83,000, besides what was made in that form; and had the payments been direct and absolute, and confined to the sum of $4,890 each, there could no question have been raised respecting those payments. They would have amounted only to the legal compensation for the use of the money. With regard to the second year, it is obvious that as yet nothing has been actually paid; but as it may be said to be secured or acknowledged by another bill, we will consider both sums as paid. And then the only exceptionable parts of the payment will be the sum of $498, added to that actually paid for the first year, and $174.30 added to the bill drawn for the rent of the second year. As to the cash, it is a simple allowance of interest upon a bill drawn for the $4,980, upon its being returned and taken up by another, and cannot be excepted to. And, as to the first, we perceive in the transaction about the second payment, a sufficient explanation of the origin of the addition made in that instance. As Prentiss acquiesced in having a bill drawn for the second year, payable in Philadelphia, we may reasonably conclude that the agreement was to pay the rent or interest, whichever it may be called, by drawing such a bill. If, then, such a bill was drawn, and re-391*] turned for non-payment, it may *afford an easy solution of the question upon what principle that addition was made.

But why, for so inconsiderable a sum, should we perplex ourselves with difficulties in so large a transaction? It could, at most, in common with all the items we have been examining, have furnished only a ground for a deduction, certainly not for dismissing the bill. Nor should we have proceeded to examine these items in detail, were it not that the court below will have to make a decree upon which it will be necessary to allow or disallow these items. Nor, when it is considered under what circumstances this second contract was entered into, would this court, upon slight grounds, be induced to open it.

The parties had previously entered into a contract avowedly usurious with relation to the interest reserved. The defendant intimates his intention to avail himself of the defense of usury, and the parties sit down together for the sole and express purpose of purging it of all usurious taint, and to arrange a new contract respecting the same loan which should be legally obligatory.

Is it, then, probable, that any deduction would have been withheld, which, by being retained, could affect the new contract with usury, or with any of the incidents of usury? Would De Wolf have trusted himself again in the hands of Prentiss, by mixing up anything with this contract on which a legal exception could be sustained? We think not.

But one of the counsel for the appellees has placed the objection to the complainant's right to *relief on a more general ground [*392 than the receipt of usury, or the avoidance of the contract under statute. He insists that it is enough for this court to refuse its aid, that the contract of 1815 was prohibited by law, although not avoided by law.

That a court of equity will not lend its aid to an illegal or unconscionable bargain is true. But the argument carries this principle rather too far as applied to this case. The law of Rhode Island certainly forbids the contract of loan for a greater interest than six per cent., and so far no court would lend its aid to recover such interest. But the law goes no farther; it does not forbid the contract of loan, nor preclude the recovery of the principal under any circumstances. The sanctions of that law are the loss of the interest, and a penalty to the amount of the whole interest, and one-third of the principal if sued for within a year. On what principle could this court add another to the penalties declared by the law itself?

But the case does not rest here. The subsequent legal contract of 1817 rescued the case from the frowns of the law. Courts of justice will not shut the door in the face of the penitent; and hence it has been decided, in a case very analogous to the present, that although a contract be in its inception usurious, a subsequent agreement to free it from the illegal incident shall make it good. 1 Campb. Rep. 165, note; 2 Taunt. Rep. 184.

According to the views, then, which we have *exhibited of the case, the principal sum [*393 of the loan of 1815 was a subsisting debt at the date of the contract of 1817, and unaffected by any of the deductions contended for in the several items which we have considered. There was, then, a good consideration for the contract of 1817, and it is legally valid to the amount which it purports on the face of it.

But if it were otherwise, there are two views of this subject upon which the court below ought to have sustained the bill.

It is very clear that the Kentucky contract must be considered as a new and substantive contract. It is governed by a distinct code of laws from the Rhode Island contract, and cannot be affected by the taint of usury which might have been transmitted to it under some circumstances, had it taken place in Rhode Island. It was, then, equivalent to a payment and reloan; and no one can doubt that money paid on an usurious contract is not recoverable back beyond the amount of the usury paid.

Again, it is perfectly established that the plea of usury, at least as far as to landed security, is personal and peculiar; and however a third person, having an interest in the land, may be affected incidentally by a usurious contract, he cannot take advantage of the usury. Some exceptions may exist to this rule under bankrupt systems, but they are statutory and peculiar.

Here, then, the case presents a third person, the assignee of an equity of redemption, setting up a defense, which, in one aspect, Prentiss 394*] himself *cannot set up; and which, in another aspect, he has not set up; but, on the contrary, under the state of the pleadings, must be supposed to have refused to set up, or have abandoned. These views are independent of the effect of notice, or of the peculiar circumstances of the notice in this case.

It is true, the Johnsons deny the notice prior to the deed of trust. But previous notice is immaterial, since the notice with which the law affects them, is that which the deed to Barry, under which they claim, communicates to him as assignee. In the actual case, the notice is peculiarly strong and pointed, since the only description of the lands in question, in the deed to Barry, is contained in a reference for description to the mortgage to De Wolf, and the purpose is explicitly declared to give priority to that mortgage. Technically and morally, therefore, they required no more than what should remain after satisfying De Wolf. But had they purchased from Prentiss, in the most absolute and general manner, and altogether without notice actual or constructive, they still could have acquired no more than the equity of redemption, and that would not have transferred to them the right of availing themselves of the plea of usury. We have examined the cases quoted to this point, and are satisfied with their application and correctness. It would, indeed, be astonishing were it otherwise, for the contrary rule would hold out no relief to the borrower; it would be only transferring his money from the pocket of the 395*] *lender to the pocket of the holder of the equity of redemption.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the decree must be reversed, and the cause sent back to have a decree of foreclosure entered, and carried into effect, according to the exigencies of the case.

[Lottery.]

BRENT et al. v. DAVIS.

The scheme of a lottery contained a stationary prize for the first drawn number on each of twelve days, during which the drawing was to continue, and the first drawn number on the tenth day was to be entitled to $30,000, payable in part by 300 tickets, from Nos. 501 to 800 inclusive. No. 623, one of the 300 tickets to be given in part payment of the said prize, was drawn first on that day, and decided to be entitled to the prize of $30,000. After the drawing for the day was concluded, the managers reversed this decision, and awarded the prize to No. 4760, which was drawn next to No. 623, and had drawn a prize of twenty-five dollars, which they decreed to No. 623.

In drawing the same lottery, it was discovered on the last day that the wheel of blanks and prizes contained one blank less than ought to have been put into it; and to remedy this mistake an additional blank was thrown in.

In an action brought by the managers against a person who had purchased the whole lottery, for the purchase money, it was held that these irregularities did not vitiate the drawing of the lottery, the conduct of the managers having been bona fide, and the affirmance of their acts not furnishing any inducement to the repetition of the same mistake, nor any motive for misconduct of any description.

Quære, Whether the ticket No. 623, or No. 4760, was entitled to the prize of $30,000.

*ERROR to the Circuit Court for the [*396 District of Columbia.

This cause was argued by Mr. Key for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Swann and Mr. Jones for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was the purchaser of the first class of a lottery to be drawn in the city of Washington, conformably to a scheme agreed on between the plaintiffs, who had been appointed managers, and himself; and the declaration is on the penalty of the bond given for the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the performance of articles entered into between them, one of which was that he should pay the said sum of $10,000 to the plaintiffs within sixty days after the lottery should be completed.

The defendant prayed oyer of the bond, and of the condition; after which the following entry is made: "Non damnificatus pleaded, and issue, with leave to give the special matter in evidence on both sides."

A jury was impaneled, who found a special verdict, which states at large the by-law of the corporation authorizing the lottery, the appointment of the managers, their sale of the first class to Davis, the scheme of the lottery, and the agreement entered into by him with them.

The verdict then states that the managers, and the said Davis, proceeded to draw the said *lottery, in the course of which, certain [*397 irregularities took place, which are detailed at large; and the whole progress of the lottery to its conclusion is stated.

The scheme contains a stationary prize for the first drawn number on each of twelve days, during which the drawing was to continue; which were not put into the numerical wheel. The first drawn number on the 10th day was to be entitled to $30,000, payable in part by three hundred tickets, from numbers 501 to 800 inclusive. No. 623, one of the three hundred tickets to be given in part payment of the said prize, was drawn first on that day, which was immediately proclaimed by the managers, and the prize awarded to it, by making the usual entry in a book kept for that purpose.

After the drawing for that day was concluded, the managers reconsidered their judgment, awarding the prize of $30,000 to No. 623, and reversed it. They then awarded the prize to No. 4760, which was drawn next to 623, and had drawn a prize of twenty-five dollars, which prize they decreed to No. 623; and the original entries made in the book for the registration of prizes, were transposed so as to conform to this last determination.

On the last day, it was discovered that the wheel of blanks and prizes contained one blank less than ought to have been put into it; and to remedy this mistake the managers, and the said Davis, agreed to throw in an additional 398*] blank. *The verdict appears to have been intended not only for this cause, but for another suit also, which was brought for the benefit of the proprietors of a ticket which had drawn a prize of $10,000, by the corporation of Washington against one of the managers, on a bond given for the performance of his duty. It concludes with the following findings: "If, upon the whole matter, the law be for the plaintiffs, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to demand and have of the defendant in this action, the sum of $10,000, in and by the agreement recited in the condition of the bond given by the said Gideon Davis to the said managers aforesaid, sixty days after the drawing of the said lottery is completed, then we find for the plaintiffs the debt in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages, to be discharged by the payment of $10,000.

"And if the proprietors of said prize tickets, or the said proprietors of the said ticket No. 1037, be entitled to demand and have the amount of the several prizes drawn against their respective tickets in the course of the drawings as aforesaid, after making the deduction of fifteen per cent. according to the said scheme, and if the proprietors of the said ticket No. 1037, be entitled to demand and receive payment of the said prize of $10,000, with such deduction as aforesaid against the defendent in this action, then we find for the plaintiffs the farther sum of $8,500, to the use of the said purchasers and proprietors of the said ticket No. 1,037, in equal shares and pro- 399*] portions aforesaid. And if, *upon the whole matter, the law be for the defendant, we find for the defendant."

The judgment of the court was in favor of the defendant; and that judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

If, through the confusion which is introduced into this record by the extreme irregularity of the proceedings, the court can perceive that the plaintiffs have a real cause of action which may be barred by this judgment, the justice of the case requires that it should be reversed, although the great fault in pleading has been committed by the plaintiffs in failing to assign any breach of the condition of the bond on which the suit was instituted.

The suit is supposed to be brought for the recovery of the $10,000 which the defendant engaged to pay sixty days after the lottery should be drawn. This claim is resisted on the plea that the lottery, in point of law, is not yet drawn; that the irregularities stated in the verdict have vitiated the whole transaction; that the lottery must be redrawn; and that no right of action can accrue to the plaintiffs until sixty days after such redrawing shall be concluded.

The right of the plaintiffs, then, to maintain this action, depends on the legality of the drawing as found in the special verdict.

The defendant insists that two errors have been committed in drawing the lottery, which vitiate the whole transaction. The first is the proceeding respecting the first drawn ticket on the 10th day; and the last the circumstances in *relation to the deficient ticket in the [*400 wheel of blanks and prizes.

If the ticket which was first drawn in fact, ought to be considered as entitled to the prize, as was first decided by the managers, then no irregularity whatever took place in their proceedings with regard to this ticket, and this objection is clearly at an end. If the last decision of the managers was right, still there was no irregularity in the drawing, unless the ticket No. 623 ought to have been restored to the wheel, and have taken its chance for a blank or a prize. We are not satisfied that the managers ought to have taken this course. The ticket was properly put in the wheel, and was consequently liable to be drawn out of it at any time. The scheme did not say that if any of those tickets which were to be paid in part discharge of the stationary prizes should itself draw the prize, it should be returned to the wheel and redrawn; and great objections would, without doubt, have been made to such a proceeding. It would have diminished the chance of every remaining ticket for the undrawn prizes, and would have constituted a much more valid objection than can be made to what was actually done. Had No. 623 been replaced in the wheel, and been fortunate enough again to draw a large prize, it would have been very difficult to sustain its title to that prize. This first objection to the conduct of the managers is not, we think, supported.

More difficulty is presented by the last. The mistake in the number of the tickets placed in the *wheel is undoubtedly an [*401 irregularity; but the effect it ought to have on the lottery is not so obvious. The ticket not put in the wheel was a blank; and, consequently, the omission did not diminish the chances of the adventurers. The last drawn number would find no corresponding ticket in the other wheel; but the chance of each to be the last drawn was precisely the same as the chance of each would have been to draw the blank, which ought to have been in the wheel. Had the lottery been completed without attempting to correct the error by throwing in another blank, the owner of the last drawn ticket would have been in the same situation as if the blank had remained in the wheel; and if he could be considered as having any just cause of complaint, it would seem more reasonable that the proprietors of the lottery should restore him the price of his ticket, than that the whole proceeding should be declared a nullity. The general quiet is more consulted by considering his particular contract as void for want of consideration, than by annulling all the rights acquired in the course of the drawing.

We do not think the case materially varied by placing the blank in the wheel in the course of the last day. The tickets previously drawn could not be affected by this act. The rights to prizes which had been previously vested could not be devested by this act. It could affect nothing which had been done, and was of importance to those tickets only which remained in the wheel. It did not in the slight-402*] est degree vary their *chance. There were the same number of prizes and the same number of blanks, with this only difference—had the blank not been put in the wheel, the last ticket would have drawn nothing; whereas by putting it in the wheel, it did not necessarily fall to the lot of the last ticket. But the aggregate of chances remained precisely the same. It appears to have been one of those unimportant incidents, which, having been found to be accidental, ought not to have so essential and so disquieting an effect as unsettling all that had been done would have.

The establishment of the lottery thus drawn can be attended with no pernicious consequence. The transaction was, throughout, perfectly fair; and if the managers have committed an error; it was unintentional, and unimportant. The affirmance of their acts can furnish no inducement to the repetition of the same mistakes, nor any motive for misconduct of any description. But let it be settled, that the absence of a blank at the conclusion of a lottery shall vitiate the whole transaction, and it is not difficult to perceive how frequently motives may exist for producing that state of things. However questionable may be the policy of tolerating lotteries, there can be no question respecting the policy of removing, as far as possible, from those who are concerned in them, all temptation to fraud.

The case of Madison et al. v. Vaughan, decided in the Court of Appeals of Virginia, is supposed by the defendants to be an authority for declaring that this lottery ought 403*] to be redrawn. *In that case, a number corresponding to the number of one of the tickets was not put into the wheel, and two blanks more than the proper number were put into it. Chancellor Wythe considered the lottery as well drawn; but his decree was reversed in the Court of Appeals. Supposing the decree of reversal to be correct, there is some difference between the cases. One ticket not being in the wheel, the proprietor of it did not partake of the chance to which every adventurer had an equal right; and there being two more blanks in the wheel than were allowed by the scheme, the chances of every ticket were diminished. If when all the numbers for the tickets which had been put in the wheel were drawn, two blanks had remained undrawn, it would be difficult to show that any injury had been done to a ticket-holder by the two additional blanks; but if one or two prizes had remained undrawn, it would be obvious that some ticket had drawn a blank which ought to have drawn a prize, and this circumstance would have afforded stronger reason for the decree that the whole proceeding must be considered as a nullity.

The case of Neilson v. Mott (2 Binn. 301) was a suit brought by the proprietor of a lottery against a purchaser of 500 lottery tickets, on a note given by him for the purchase money, which was payable one day after the conclusion of the drawing of the lottery. In the wheel containing the numbers of the tickets, the numbers of thirty-nine tickets were omitted, and in the same wheel there were 404*] duplicates of thirty-nine numbers. *The proprietors had satisfied all the holders of the duplicate numbers except four or five, and had offered to indemnify all by public advertisement. A day or two before the last day's drawing, the managers opened the wheel, and discovered that there was one number omitted and another put in twice, which they altered.

The defendant resisted the payment of his note, because the lottery was not legally drawn, the whole being vitiated by this mistake.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff, on the ground that the drawing was not vitiated by these irregularities. Two of the judges were of opinion, that as the defendant had sustained no injury by them, he could not avail himself of them; and the third (the court consisting of three) thought he had waived his right by not returning his tickets, and by receiving the prizes he had drawn.

The case of Schinotti v. Bumstead et al. 6 D. & E. 646, was an action brought by the holder of a ticket claiming a prize allotted in the scheme to that which should be last drawn in the lottery.

The number of one ticket had not been put into the wheel; and the demand made by the owner of the ticket which was last actually drawn, was resisted, on the ground that the ticket not yet drawn, for which a correspondent blank remained in the wheel, must be the last. Lord Kenyon said, that as the plaintiff's ticket was the last drawn, he is entitled to the prize; the *only competitor with him [*405 was the owner of a ticket which never was drawn, and that person has no claim to it whatever.

So far as respects the omission to put the number of one ticket into the wheel, this case bears an exact resemblance to Madison et al. v. Vaughan, and is, perhaps, stronger than the case under consideration. The omission of a ticket is, at least, as irregular and as important as the omission of a blank, and yet, in Shinotti v. Bumstead et al., no suggestion was made against the validity of the drawing.

Upon these authorities, and upon the reason and substantial justice of the case, this court is of opinion that the lottery in the special verdict mentioned has been legally drawn, and that the defendant became liable to the plaintiffs, sixty days after it was concluded, for the sum of $10,000. The judgment, therefore, in favor of the defendant, must be reversed. But the pleadings are too defective to sustain a judgment on this verdict for the plaintiffs. The verdict, therefore, and the pleadings, up to the declaration, must be set aside, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court, that farther proceedings may be had therein according to law.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

*THE CORPORATION OF WASHINGTON, for the use of M'Cue et al.,
v.
MOSES YOUNG.

Where the manager of a lottery, drawn in pursuance of an ordinance of the corporation of the city of Washington, gave a bond to the corporation, conditioned "truly and impartially to execute the duty and authority vested in him by the ordinance;" held, that the person entitled to a prize ticket had no right to bring a suit for the prize against the manager, upon his bond, in the name of the corporation, without their consent.

THIS cause was argued by the same counsel with the preceding.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was the manager of a lottery, drawn in pursuance of an ordinance of the corporation of Washington, and gave his bond to the corporation in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned "truly and impartially to execute the duty and authority vested in him by the ordinance."

The declaration was on the penalty of the bond; after oyer of which, and of the condition, the defendant pleaded non damnificatus, upon which there was issue, with leave to give the special matter in evidence on both sides.

A jury was impaneled, who found the special verdict stated in the preceding case of Brent et 407*] *al. v. Davis, with this additional circumstance, which, having no connection with that case, was not stated in it. The ticket No. 1037 drew a prize of $10,000. It had been sold in quarter shares to several persons, but had remained in possession of the said Gideon Davis, who gave to each purchaser a certificate specifying the interest he held in the ticket. After the drawing was completed, but before the institution of this suit, Gideon Davis delivered the said ticket, No. 1037, to the managers, towards securing and paying of the moneys stipulated to be paid by him under his contract for the purchase of the lottery.

This suit is instituted for the benefit of the purchasers of the ticket No. 1037, without the consent of the corporation.

The judgment of the court was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs have sued out a writ of error to bring the cause into this court.

The first inquiry is, into the right of the proprietors of the ticket No. 1037, to sue in the name of the corporation without its consent. Their counsel insists that the bond was taken for the benefit of the fortunate adventurers in the lottery, and that each has a right to use it. In support of this proposition, he has cited the case of M'Mechen v. The Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, decided in the Court of Appeals of Maryland in the year 1806. That was a writ of error to a judgment confessed in the general court, in an action brought by the corporation on a bond given by Thomas Yates 408*] and Archibald *Campbell, with their sureties, conditioned for the performance of their duty as auctioneers. The court determined that the suit was to be considered as brought by authority of the corporation, although no warrant of attorney was shown; and that the confession was an admission of the right to recover the penalty of the bond; whether in their own right, or for the use of another, was immaterial.

The opinion was also expressed, as stated by the reporters in a note, that every person whose money was withheld by the auctioneers, had a right to apply to the city council to direct a suit to be instituted on the bond; and the corporation could not, consistently with their duty under the ordinance, refuse such application, and might be enjoined by suit in chancery to allow the person to use their name to prosecute his claim.

Had this been the direct judgment of the court, it could not have sustained the pretensions of the proprietors of this ticket to maintain this suit under the circumstances which attend it. They had undoubtedly "a right to apply to the corporation to direct the suit, and the corporation could not, consistently with their duty, have refused such application," if the purpose of the bond was to secure the fortunate adventures in the lottery, not to protect the corporation itself. But the propriety of bringing such suit was a subject on which the obligees had themselves a right to judge. If the proprietors of one prize ticket had an interest in this bond, the proprietors of every other prize ticket had the same interest; *and it would not be in the power of [*409 the first bold adventurer who should seize and sue upon it, to appropriate it to his own use, and to force the obligees to appear in court as plaintiffs against their own will. No person who is not the proprietor of an obligation, can have a legal right to put it in suit, unless such right be given by the legislature; and no person can be authorized to use the name of another, without his assent given in fact, or by legal intendment. The declaration of the judge in the case cited from Harris & Johnson, that a court of chancery might enjoin the obligees to allow the injured person to use their names in that particular case, is evidence of the opinion that he could not sue at his own will. We think, then, that this case is no authority for the power claimed by the proprietors of the ticket No. 1037; and we think, upon general principles, they had no right to institute this suit without the consent of the corporation.

But we think, also, that the corporation itself must be considered as the real plaintiff, and that its right to prosecute the suit cannot be affected by the allegation that it is brought for the benefit of others.

It has been determined in this court, that the warrant of attorney need not be spread on the record, to enable counsel to appear for a corporation; and if the dismission of the suit be not ordered, the consent of the corporation will be presumed after verdict.[1] If, in its progress, the *court shall perceive that it is [*410 brought without authority, the proper course would seem to be to dismiss it; not to render judgment for the defendant, which might, where no special breach is assigned, bar any other action.

The proprietors of the ticket No. 1037 have shown no right to sue on this bond. Their remedy is certainly directly against Gideon Davis; and, in the event of his insolvency, it may be against the managers. But if they have, without authority, put this bond in suit, the proper course is to turn them out of court, not to render a judgment, which may bar any future suit brought by the plaintiffs, whose names have been improperly used.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, therefore, must be reversed; but as the pleadings are so incomplete as not to show what judgment ought to be entered, the proceedings are set aside up to the declaration, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court, to be farther proceeded in according to law.

Judgment reversed accordingly.

v.

THE COLUMBIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Under a policy containing the following clause: "It is declared and understood, that if the abovementioned brig, after a regular survey, should be condemned for being unsound and rotten, the insurers shall not be bound to pay the sum hereby insured, nor any part thereof." A survey by the master and wardens of the port of New Orleans, which was obtained at the instance of the master, who was also a part owner, and was transmitted by him to the other part owner, and by the latter laid before the underwriters as proof of the loss, stated, that the wardens "ordered one streak of plank fore and aft to be taken out, about three feet below the bends on the starboard side; and found the timber and bottom plank so much decayed that we were unanimously of opinion her repairs would cost more than she would be worth afterwards, and that it would be for the interest of all concerned she should be condemned as unworthy of repair on that ground. We did, therefore, condemn her as not seaworthy, and as unworthy of repair; and, therefore, according to the powers vested by law in the master and wardens of this port, we do hereby order and direct the aforesaid damaged brig to be sold at public auction for the account of the insurers thereof, or whomsoever the same may concern." It was held, that the survey was conclusive evidence, under the clause, to discharge the insurers from their liability for the loss.

Quære, How far the state legislatures may authorize the condemnation of vessels as unseaworthy, by tribunals or boards constituted under state authority, in the absence of any general regulation made by Congress, under its power of regulating commerce, as a branch of the admiralty jurisdiction.

However this may be, the above condemnation not being specially authorized by any law of the state of Louisiana, it would not have been considered as conclusive evidence within the clause, had not the condemnation been obtained by the master, as the agent of the owners, and afterwards adopted by them as proof of the facts stated therein.

412*] *ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This was an action brought in the court below by the plaintiff in error, Janney, against the defendants in error, the Columbian Insurance Company, on a policy of insurance on the brig Hunter, Grinnolds, lost or not lost, from Alexandria to Norfolk and New Orleans; in which policy there was the following clause: "It is declared and understood, that if the abovementioned brig, after a regular survey, should be condemned for being unsound or rotten, the insurers shall not be bound to pay the sum hereby insured, nor any part thereof."

On the first trial of the cause, the jury, not agreeing on a verdict, was discharged; and, on the second trial, a verdict was found for the defendants, under an instruction from the court to the following effect, as stated in the bill of exceptions:

And the plaintiff offered to prove, by parol evidence, that at the time that the said brig Hunter sailed from the port of Alexandria upon her voyage aforesaid, and at the time she was surveyed and condemned at New Orleans as hereinafter mentioned, she was sound, and that the repairs of vessels, and materials of shipbuilding, at that place, were very high: and that the prices there would have amounted to two or three times as much as the prices would have amounted to in the port of Alexandria; and that the repairs of the said vessel, arising from the injuries which she *had [*413 sustained in her voyage to New Orleans, would not have amounted to less, in that place, than $2,000, independent of the detention of the vessel, and the other necessary expenses of the voyage. But the defendants produced, and read in evidence to the jury, a regular survey, called upon the state and condition of the vessel on her arrival at New Orleans, by the said Capt. Grinnolds, master and part owner; and by him transmitted to the plaintiff to be laid before the insurance office as evidence of loss; and actually laid before such office by the plaintiff accordingly; and, at the former trial, read on the part of the plaintiff in evidence to the jury, in the words following:

Whereupon the defendant prayed the opinion of the court, and their instruction to the jury, that the said survey is conclusive evidence that the said vessel was condemned for being unsound and rotten; and that it is not competent for the plaintiff to produce evidence inconsistent with said survey, to prove that the said vessel was, in fact, sound at the time of such survey; and that, upon such evidence, 416*] the plaintiff is not entitled *to recover under the policy given in evidence in this case; and the court so accordingly instructed the jury, and refused to suffer the said evidence to be given to the jury.

A verdict and judgment thereon having been rendered for the defendants, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court; and was argued by Mr. Swann for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Jones for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This case varies somewhat in form, but nothing in principle, from the case of Dorr v. The Pacific Insurance Company, 7 Wheat. Rep. 582. The material point of distinction is this: In that case the discharge of the underwriters was made to depend on a regular survey alone; the stipulation was, "that if the vessel, upon a regular survey, should be thereby declared unseaworthy by reason of her being unsound or rotten," the policy should be discharged. And hence, although a condemnation in the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Bahamas was produced in evidence in that cause, the court makes no other use of it, than as a means of authenticating the survey upon which the decree was made.

The terms of the present stipulation are these: "If the above-mentioned brig, after a regular survey, should be condemned for being unsound or rotten," the insurers are to be discharged. From which it is obvious, that both a regular survey and a condemnation are in contemplation *of the parties. And the [*417 question is, whether the bill of exceptions makes out the casus fœderis.

This gives rise to three questions: Was the survey regular? was the condemnation conformable to the contract? and does the one or the other bring the case within the terms of the stipulation? With regard to the survey, the case is a very clear one. The laws of Louisiana contain ample and judicious provisions on this subject. The master and wardens of the port of Orleans are vested with various powers, and required to keep an office and a book of record open to all the world; they possess, in fact, some of the attributes of a municipal court. With regard to damaged vessels, the vessels deemed unfit to proceed to sea, they, or any two of them, with one or more skilful carpenters, are constituted surveyors; and the laws enjoin, "that they shall, upon every such survey, certify under their hands, how the vessels so surveyed appeared to them, and shall cause entries to be made in a book to be kept for that purpose in their office." A survey, therefore, made by them, pursuant to this law, and at the call of the captain of this vessel, was emphatically a regular survey.

The difficulty in the cause arises upon the next member of the clause under consideration, to wit, that which requires a condemnation. The certificate of the survey purports that there was, in fact, a condemnation of the vessel; but there is nothing in the laws of Louisiana which vests the power expressly in the master and wardens of the port to condemn a vessel as unfit for sea or *unworthy of repair. [*418 As to damaged merchandise, the power is expressly given; but as to ships, it appears to be exercised as incidental to the surveying power. In other parts of the world, it is very generally exercised as an incident to the admiralty power; and the admiralty jurisdiction under our system, can only be exercised under the laws of the United States.

These considerations are only thrown out to preclude the supposition that the court has not had them in mind whilst considering this subject. We do not mean to intimate that the power is one which cannot be exercised under municipal regulations. On the contrary, there are many reasons for maintaining that it may be so exercised until Congress may think proper to establish some general rule upon the subject, either as one appertaining to trade and commerce, or within the admiralty jurisdiction. If, therefore, there had been express provision on the subject in the laws of Louisiana, or it had been shown to be recognized as a power known and habitually exercised in that port, as an incident to the surveying power, we should have felt no difficulty on this point. As it is, we must place our opinion on another ground, one, however, which is also noticed in Dorr's case. It is this, that the condemnation, such as it is, was obtained through the instrumentality of the master, who, as such, represented his employers, and who was, in fact, in this instance, also a part owner. In this condemnation he acquiesced, broke up the voyage, and sold the vessel; and the certificates now before this 419*] *court were transmitted to the underwriters, and actually, in a former trial between the same parties, made evidence to prove the fact which they ascertain. It is, then, too late for the plaintiffs to dispute the validity or verity of the act of condemnation. They have recognized the jurisdiction of the tribunal they appealed to, to obtain the survey, as sufficient also to make the condemnation, and must be held to abide by it as such. All further and other investigation in a more competent tribunal, if there was such, was rendered impossible by their act.

It only remains, then, to determine whether the facts ascertained by the survey are such as bring the case within the terms of the stipulation.

We are of opinion they are. It would be difficult to find a shade of difference in this respect, between the present case and that of Dorr. The terms of this certificate are, "we found the timbers and bottom plank so much decayed that we are unanimously of opinion her repairs would cost more than she would be worth afterwards; and that it would be for the interest of all concerned she should be condemned as unworthy of repairs on that ground. We did, therefore, condemn her as not seaworthy, and as unworthy of repairs Now, it cannot be questioned that the ground of condemnation here stated does not stand single and unconnected with the estimated cost of repairs. But does this vary the case? We are of opinion it does not, since the condemnation of a vessel, 420*] on account of decay, can *never, in its nature, stand single and unconnected with the expense of repairs. It is the commonplace to which the question of condemnation must always have reference. It is hardly possible to conceive a case where a survey would be called in which a vessel might not be repaired or renovated, and still leave enough of the hull to maintain her identity. A state of hopeless and absolute decay, therefore, is never in the contemplation of the contract. And whether expressed or not, the consideration whether the value when repaired would exceed the expense, invariably enters into the decision of surveyors upon a question of seaworthiness.

As, then, her being decayed, so as to be unworthy of repairs, is equivalent to, and in fact the technical meaning of, unseaworthiness, we are of opinion that the certificate brings the case within the words of the stipulation.

It follows, that the court were correct in refusing the evidence offered by the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

SIXTY PIPES OF BRANDY.

Kennedy & Maitland, Claimants.

Under the duty act of 1799, c. 126 (CXXVI.), s. 43, it is no cause of forfeiture that the casks, which are marked and accompanied with the certificates required by the act, contain distilled spirits which have not been imported into the United States, or a mixture of domestic with foreign spirits the object of the act being the security of the revenue, without interfering with those mercantile devices which look only to individual profit without defrauding the government.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Massachusetts.

This cause was argued by Mr. Emmet for the appellants and claimants, and by Mr. Webster for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

The libel in this case contains two allegations, and the amended or supplemental libel contains a third.

The first is, that these sixty pipes of brandy were imported from abroad, and landed in the port of Boston without a permit. The second, that they were not accompanied with the marks and certificates required by law. And the third, *that they were imported from [*422 abroad, and landed in the port of New York without a permit.

To the first and third of these allegations, the record furnishes no evidence, nor, in fact, is it contended that the article seized is to be visited by the penalties inflicted for those offenses, otherwise than as an incident to the cause of forfeiture contained in the second allegation.

The passage of the law on which the libelants claim the forfeiture, is in these words: "And if any casks, etc., containing distilled spirits, etc., which, by the foregoing provisions, ought to be marked and accompanied with certificates, shall be found in possession of any person, unaccompanied with such marks and certificates, it shall be presumptive evidence that the same are liable to forfeiture, and it shall be lawful for any officer of the customs, or of inspection, to seize them as forfeited; and if, upon the trial, in consequence of such seizure, the owner or claimant of the spirits, etc., seized, shall not prove that they were imported into the United States according to law, and the duties thereupon paid or secured, they shall be adjudged to be forfeited."

The fact that these casks were accompanied with certificates is not questioned, nor that the certificates accompanying them were those which issued from the custom-house upon those identical casks. But it is contended that the identity of the spirits is destroyed by a large admixture of other spirits; and that, by the true construction of the law, such a change falsifies the certificate, and the casks are no 423*] longer, in the sense of *the law, "accompanied by certificates." And, further, that such a change justified the seizure, and wherever the seizure is just, the onus probandi is thrown upon the claimant, and he is held to comply strictly with the words of the law, and prove the spirits which they contain to have been "imported according to law, and the duties thereon paid, or secured to be paid."

That such a construction of the law is carrying its penal effects beyond the literal meaning of its terms, we understand no one to deny. The words are, "if any casks containing distilled spirits, which ought to be marked and accompanied with certificates," etc. That these words must necessarily be confined to the casks, and cannot extend to its contents, results, we think, from requiring the article to be marked, as well as accompanied with the certificate; a requisition, absurd in terms, if applied to the distilled spirits contained in the casks. And although the term, "the same," used in the member of the sentence which imposes the forfeiture, might, with grammatical correctness, be applied exclusively to the cask, and thereby produce a greater absurdity, yet it may, with as much propriety, be applied to both the cask and spirits as its antecedent; and this application is sustained by the subsequent words of the same period; which speak expressly and exclusively of the "claimant of the spirits," and leave the cask to be claimed only as an incident to the property in the spirits.

The constituents of the offense here intended to be visited on the claimant, obviously are, 424*] *(1) That the cask should contain distilled spirits. (2) That it should be one which the law requires should be marked and accompanied with a certificate, that is, one that has been used for foreign spirits. (3) That it should be found in the possession of some person unaccompanied with the legal mark and certificates. When these three facts concur, the property is presumed subject to forfeiture; and it follows, that unless all the constituents unite in the given case, it must be a case of innocence. But the whole argument of the libelant goes to impose a fourth circumstance as essential to the imputation of innocence, and the absence of which, of consequence, must exist in order to repel the imputation of crime; which is, that the distilled spirits in the cask should be the identical spirits imported in the cask; and this, not from any necessary construction of the language of the act, but as a deduction from the supposed policy of the act.

We are induced to adopt the opinion, that even if it were consistent with the rules of construction to give a latitude to the meaning of language used in a statute so highly penal, the language of this act is so far from sanctioning the construction here contended for, that it actually repels it; for, it is observable that when the act goes on to declare what it shall be incumbent on the defendant to establish, in order to escape the penalty of the law, the identity of the spirits found in the cask, with that originally imported, is not required to be proved. It is only required that he should prove the spirits seized to have *been legally im- [*425 ported, and the duties paid, and whether in those casks, or any other casks, is altogether immaterial to his defense. Gin and brandy may interchange receptacles, and travel together in perfect security, provided they have been respectively legally imported, and the original certificates attend the casks to which they were originally attached.

From this, we think it conclusively results that the government had nothing in view but the security of its own revenue, without interfering with those devices of the mercantile world which look only to individual profit without defrauding the government; and hence, that the spirit and policy of the 43d section would carry us no further than its express letter.

But there are other views of this subject which raise other questions in adjudicating on this cause. And, first, it is very obvious that if the change of the contents of the cask could invalidate the immunities of the certificate in other cases, it could not in the case where domestic spirits have been substituted for that imported. If the evidence establishes any adulteration in this case, it proves it to have been made by the addition of American spirits to the imported brandy. But when the act imposes upon the claimant the necessity of proving "that the spirits found in the casks were imported into the United States according to law, and the duties thereon paid or secured," it could not have intended to impose an actual impossibility, by requiring such proof as to spirits which, ex vi termini, *were not [*426 imported. Much less could it have intended to leave open a chance of defense, where the substitution was of foreign liquors, upon which it might, by possibility, have been defrauded, and preclude all defense as to domestic spirits, a trade in which, coastwise or in any wise, was perfectly harmless, and could not have produced a fraud upon the revenue.

But, although the libelant may have failed on his second count, he is entitled to all the benefit which the law allows him under his first and third. And here the case rests upon the general provisions of the 50th, 70th, 71st, and some other sections of the revenue law, under which the collector was certainly justifiable in making any seizure, where he had reasonable ground to suspect that a fraud upon the revenue, or a violation of the revenue laws, was meditated. And upon showing probable cause for such seizure, the onus probandi is thrown upon the claimant. Whatever was the fact, the certificates of the numerous individuals who examined this brandy, and testified to its equivocal nature, were sufficient to attract the collector's attention, and justify his instituting an inquiry to determine whether this brandy, notwithstanding the certificates, had actually paid the duty. The brandy which had paid the duty, might, by possibility, have been drawn off, and other brandy substituted that had evaded the duty. It would be too much, also, to hold him to a correct construction of laws which have excited doubts and elicited contrary opinions in courts 427*] of justice. The claimant, therefore, *upon the general provisions of the collection law, was properly called upon to furnish an explanation of circumstances calculated to excite reasonable suspicion. After comparing the mass of testimony which the case affords, we are led to the conclusion that the claimant has successfully repelled the charge of illicit importation. If, as before observed, the brandy was not the identical brandy imported in these casks in which it was seized, still all the evidence goes to prove that it was in part the same, and in part consisted of neutral spirits, which spirits two of the witnesses call American. Illegal importation, therefore, is out of the case. And the views which we have taken of the subject render it unnecessary to examine the question, whether the evidence establishes the fact of adulteration or not.

Decree of condemnation reversed, with a certificate of probable cause.

THE STEAMBOAT THOMAS JEFFERSON. Johnson et al., Claimants.

The District Court has not jurisdiction of a suit for wages earned on a voyage, in a steam vessel, from Shippingport, in the state of Kentucky, up the river Missouri and back again to the port of departure, as a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

The admiralty has no jurisdiction over contracts for the hire of seamen, except in cases where the service is substantially performed upon the sea, or upon waters within the ebb and flow of the tide.

But the jurisdiction exists, although the commencement or termination of the voyage is at some place beyond the reach of the tide. It is sufficient if the service is essentially a maritime service.

Quære, Whether, under the power to regulate commerce among the several states, Congress may not extend the remedy, by the summary process of the admiralty, to the case of voyages on the western waters.

However this may be, the act of 1790, c. 29, for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, confines the remedy in the district courts to such cases as ordinarily belong to the admiralty jurisdiction.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought in the District Court of Kentucky for subtraction of wages. The libel claims wages earned on a voyage from Shippingport, in that state, up the river Missouri, and back again to the port of departure; and the question is, whether this case, as stated in the *libel, is of admiralty and maritime [*429 jurisdiction, or otherwise, within the jurisdiction of the District Court. The court below dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction, and the libelants have appealed from that decree to this court.

In the great struggles between the courts of common law and the admiralty, the latter never attempted to assert any jurisdiction except over maritime contracts. In respect to contracts for the hire of seamen, the admiralty never pretended to claim, nor could it rightfully exercise, any jurisdiction, except in cases where the service was substantially performed, or to be performed, upon the sea, or upon waters within the ebb and flow of the tide. This is the prescribed limit which it was not at liberty to transcend. We say the service was to be substantially performed on the sea, or on tide water, because there is no doubt that the jurisdiction exists, although the commencement or termination of the voyage may happen to be at some place beyond the reach of the tide. The material consideration is, whether the service is essentially a maritime service. In the present case, the voyage, not only in its commencement and termination, but in all its intermediate progress, was several hundreds of miles above the ebb and flow of the tide; and in no just sense can the wages be considered as earned in a maritime employment.

Some reliance has been placed in argument upon that clause of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, s. 9, which includes all seizures made on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten *or more tons burthen (of which [*430 description the waters in this case are), within the admiralty jurisdiction. But this is a statutable provision, and limited to the cases there stated. To make the argument available, it should be shown that some act of Congress had extended the right to sue in courts having admiralty jurisdiction, to cases of voyages of this nature. We have for this purpose examined the act of Congress for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service (act of 1790, ch. 29), and though its language is somewhat general, we think that its strict interpretation confines the remedy in the admiralty to such cases as ordinarily belong to its cognizance, as maritime contracts for wages. It merely recognizes the existing, and does not intend to confer any new jurisdiction. Whether, under the power to regulate commerce between the states, Congress may not extend the remedy, by the summary process of the admiralty, to the case of voyages on the western waters, it is unnecessary for us to consider. If the public inconvenience, from the want of a process of an analogous nature, shall be extensively felt, the attention of the legislature will doubtless be drawn to the subject. But we have now only to declare that the present suit is not maintainable as a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, upon acknowledged principles of law.

The decree of the Circuit Court, dismissing the libel for want of jurisdiction, is therefore affirmed.

Decree accordingly.

THE SANTA MARIA.

The Spanish Consul, Libelant.

Upon an appeal from a mandate to carry into effect a former decree of the court, nothing is before the court but the proceedings subsequent to the mandate.

But the original proceedings are always before the court, so far as is necessary to determine any new points in controversy between the parties, which are not terminated by the original decree.

After a general decree of restitution in this court, the captors, or purchasers under them, cannot set up in the court below new claims for equitable deductions, meliorations and charges, even if such claims might have been allowed, had they been asserted before the original decree.

Nor can the claimants, or original owners, in such a case, set up a claim for interest upon the stipulation taken in the usual form, for the appraised value of the goods, interest not being mentioned in the stipulation itself.

Nor can interest be decreed against the captors personally, by way of damages for the detention and delay, no such claim having been set up, upon the original hearing in the court below, or upon the original appeal to this court.

The case of Rose v. Himely, 5 Cranch, 313, reviewed, explained, and confirmed.

Upon a mandate to the Circuit Court, to carry into effect a general decree or restitution by this court, where the property has been delivered upon a stipulation for the appraised value, and the duties paid upon it by the party to whom it is delivered, the amount of the duties is to be deducted from the appraised value.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This cause was formerly before the court, and the decision then pronounced will be 432*] found reported, *ante, Vol. VII. p. 490. The claim of Mr. Burke, as a bonæ fidei purchaser, was then rejected, upon the ground of the illegality of the original capture, it having been made in violation of the neutrality of the United States; and a general decree of restitution was awarded in favor of the libelant, suing in his official character as the consul of Spain, for the benefit of the original owners. A mandate issued from this court to the court below, to carry that decree into effect. Pending the original proceedings in the court below, and before the appeal, the property, upon the application of Mr. Burke, was delivered to him, upon a stipulation given with sureties in the usual manner, for the payment of the appraised value, according to the future decree of the court. The appraisers estimated the property at $7,473.43, being, as they declare, "the long price, including custom-house duties," and for this sum, the stipulation was given. Upon the application to the court below, to enforce the mandate of this court, Mr. Burke filed a petition, asserting that he had incurred cost and expenses, and paid certain liens upon the property. The specifications now insisted on, were the following: (1) Insurance on the property from Galveztown to Baltimore, viz., $751.25. (2) Duties paid on the same at Baltimore, viz., $1,945.14. A petition was also filed on behalf of Mr. Burke and a Mr. Forbes (who now, for the first time, appeared in the cause), as joint owners of the schooner Harriet, in which the property in question *was [*433 brought from Galveztown to Baltimore, praying for the allowance of freight for the voyage, amounting to $1,500. The libelant also made an application for interest upon the amount of the stipulation to be decreed in his favor, either from the time of capture, from the date of the stipulation, or from the decree of this court.

The respective claims of all the parties for these allowances were rejected by the Circuit Court, and from the decree dismissing them an appeal was taken to this court.

The Attorney-General, for the appellant, Burke, stated that the allegation demanding restitution in the original case, was filed by the Spanish consul against the goods, and the appellant claimed the cargo as having been remitted to him in return for an outward cargo shipped to his agent at Matagorda. It is now alleged that he was part owner of the capturing vessel, and, therefore, as a wrongdoer, not entitled to the equitable deductions he claims. He insists that he is a bonæ fidei purchaser, without notice of the illegal capture, and, therefore, entitled to be allowed for duties and other charges. In the admiralty, the libelant and claimant are both actors.[1] If, therefore, it had been the wish of the libelant to put in issue the fact of Burke's knowledge of, or connection with, the illegal capture, he should have answered the averment which is contained *in the claim, that he (Burke) [*434 was entirely ignorant of, and unconnected with, that transaction; or he should have filed an amended libel, and charged the guilt of Burke. The libelant did neither; and thus the fact of Burke's guilt or innocence was not in issue in that case. It was not involved in the decision of the court, which turned on the facts of the illegal armament of the Patriota in the ports of the United States, the capture of the Santa Maria by that vessel, and the identity of the goods as part of the cargo of the Santa Maria. These facts being established, it was immaterial who the owners of the capturing vessel were, or how the goods came into the possession of Burke. Restitution was decreed to the original owners, and it was in the execution of this decree under the mandate from this court, that the proceedings now in question took place. Upon the present appeal, nothing is before the court but what is subsequent to the mandate.[2] The respondents cannot, therefore, enter into the question of the guilt or innocence of Burke, upon the evidence in the original cause. He is now to be considered as an innocent purchaser, and entitled as such to all equitable deductions, meliorations, and charges.

Besides the other claims which are now insisted on, there was a minor claim in the court below for the difference between the valuation and the actual sales, which was withdrawn up-

2.—Rose v. Himely, 5 Cranch's Rep. 313.

435*] on the authority *of the case of The Betsey, and other cases cited in a note to that case.[1]

To the claims for duties, insurance, and freight, it was objected in the Circuit Court that the court had no authority to consider them, because the original decree of this court had closed the door against all inquiry into the subject, upon the principle settled in Rose v. Himely. But this was a misapplication of the principle determined in that case. The question on the first appeal was merely as to the proprietary interest of the cargo. But after the principal question in the cause has been finally decided, and the cause quoad hoc perpetually disposed of, any question of charge upon the original fund may still be taken up as a new question, so long as the fund remains within the power of the court. Such is undertsood to be the practice, both in England and in this country.[2] Considering Burke as an innocent purchaser of the goods, who had brought them to the United States, where they were claimed by the original owners, and restored to them, because of the defect of title in those from whom Burke had purchased, this case cannot be distinguished in principle from that of Rose v. Himely, in which freight, insurance, duties and other expenses, were allowed, under the same circumstances.[3] The charges and expenses in 436*] the present *case, having been actually borne by the innocent purchaser, in bringing the goods safely into the country, seem to enter into the value of the article themselves; and in withdrawing them from the possession of the purchaser, a re-imbursement of his actual expenses is required by natural equity, and may be considered as a species of mitigated salvage. The claim for the amount of the duties rests upon higher grounds. Wherever goods are sold by order of court, or consent of parties, the duties attach as upon an ordinary importation; and upon restitution of the proceeds, the amount of the duties is to be deducted.[4] The party gets more than the value of the goods if he gets the amount of the duties; and the purchaser pays the duties twice over to the government as duties, and again to the original owner, as part of the long price value of his goods.

As to the claim by the other party for interest upon the appraised value, so far as it is claimed from the time of capture, the question is not before this court, because it was not, made in the court below. Nor can it be allowed from the date of the stipulation, because the stipulation is a mere substitute for the specific goods, which would not have carried interest. The principle of Rose v. Himely applies to this demand, since it is the nature of a claim for damages for the illegal detention and delay, which were prayed in the original libel, but 437*] which were not allowed by *the court below, nor by this court, upon the first appeal. Interest might, doubtless, have been expressly reserved in the stipulation, if the court below had deemed the party entitled to it. But these questions are definitively closed by the original decree, and cannot arise upon the mandate to carry that decree into effect.

Mr. D. Hoffman, contra, insisted that the original proceedings in the cause showed that Burke was a participater in the illegal seizure of this property, and, consequently, could not claim any equitable deductions from the full value on account of charges incurred by him in its preservation. He was a malæ fidei possessor, who was not entitled to be allowed for his expenses actually laid out upon the property, still less for the fictitious charges of freight, insurance, and duties. As to the duties, they have been incurred solely by his electing to import the goods for consumption. Had they been delivered to the original owners, and carried away by them, or had they never been brought in, they would not have been subject to duties. There was a manifest inconsistency in the opposite argument, which would not admit the stipulation to carry interest, whilst it sought to diminish the principal sum specified in the stipulation, by claims which might have been made upon the original hearing. But there is no principle, authority, or established practice, which requires, that where the goods have been delivered on bail, the court should, cotemporaneously, decree restitution of the specific *thing, and the performance of the stip- [*438 ulation. The court may decree restitution generally, and in executing the decree it is to be applied to the stipulation, so as to include not only what is substantially comprehended in the decree, but every equitable demand consistent with it, although not expressly included in its terms. The allowance of interest by the court below, after the original decree in this court, does not so much depend upon the circumstance of its being expressly reserved upon the face of the stipulation, as upon the notorious fact that the court would be subsequently called on to act definitively upon the stipulation, when it came to execute the final decree of this court. In thus executing it, by allowing interest, the court below would not modify or add to the original decree of this court, since this allowance opens nothing which had been adjudicated by this court, and is to be regarded as nothing more than an incident to the execution of the decree of restitution. That restitution would have been incomplete without it, as, if the property had not been delivered to the capturing claimant upon bail, it might have been delivered in the same manner to the original owner, or sold by order of court, and the proceeds invested in stocks bearing an interest.

As to the case of Rose v. Himely, it will be found that the court there assumes that the question of interest was before it on the original appeal, and asserts that if the claim had then been made, it would have been rejected, because *the court did not consider the [*439 appellants as infected by the marine trespass committed by the captors. "The circumstances of the case were such as to restrain the court from inserting in its decree anything which might increase its severity. The loss was heavy, and it fell unavoidably on one of two innocent parties. The court was not inclined to add to its weight by giving interest in the nature of damages. The allowance of interest, therefore, in the court below, is overruled."[1] Besides, in that case, the court had all the questions of equitable deductions and allowances before them on the original appeal, and gave a very special decree and mandate, which, ex industria, omitted interest. But here the question is not between two equally innocent parties. Here none of the questions of freight, insurance, duties, and interest, were raised in the original cause. They were all reserved as incidental to the stipulation, which was not then brought before this court.

The doctrine laid down in Rose v. Himely, that after a decree in this court, and the cause sent by mandate to the court below, and the further proceedings upon the mandate are appealed from, nothing is before this court on the appeal but what is subsequent to the mandate, is unquestionably a sound and salutary rule. But is it anything more than what the general principles of law could establish? Is it anything more than an application of the familiar 440*] maxim as to res *adjudicata? "Nothing is before this court," says the Chief Justice, "but what is subsequent to the mandate." This is unquestionably true, but with this indispensable qualification, that the matter in question prior to the mandate was, or ought necessarily to have been, before the court originally. The rule was applied to the claims of freight and insurance which the original decree of this court had expressly allowed, but which the commissioner appointed by the Circuit Court under the mandate had disallowed. But no case can be found which requires the court below to pass any decree, in the first instance, upon the stipulation, or to allow interest before the appeal, or which requires the question of interest, or any similar incidental claim, to be brought before this court upon the original appeal. The rule in regard to matters prior or subsequent to the mandate, appears to be understood precisely in this manner by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in Martin v. Hunter. "A final judgment of this court is conclusive upon the rights which it decides, and no statute has provided any process by which this court can revise its own judgments."[2]

The claim for interest is an incident to the execution of the mandate for restitution. Interest is impliedly due, wherever a liquidated sum of money is wrongfully withheld. "If a man has my money by way of loan, he ought to answer interest; but if he detains my money 441*] wrongfully, *he ought, a fortiori, to answer interest; and it is still stronger, when one by wrong takes from me my money or goods, which I am trading with, in order to turn them into money."[3] Were not this the case, a strong temptation would be presented to debtors to violate their duty. In the language of Lord Mansfield, "they would be encouraged to make use of all the unjust dilatoriness of chicane, and the more the plaintiff is injured, the less he will be relieved." This is emphatically applicable to the present case, where the capturing claimant has superadded to the original wrong done to the owners of these goods, all the unjust dilatoriness of chicane.[4]

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

Several preliminary questions have been argued, which must be disposed of before the court can entertain any question upon the merits of these claims; and if disposed of one way, they put an end to the controversy.

In the first place, it is asserted that Mr. Burke is a malæ fidei claimant, entitled to no favor whatever; and by reference to the original proceedings, *will be found a party [*442 to the wrongful capture and detention of the property. And the first question, therefore, that arises, is, whether upon this appeal the court can look into those proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining the guilt or innocence of the claimant. The principle laid down in the case of Rose v. Himely, 5 Cranch, 313, that upon an appeal from a mandate, nothing is before the court but the proceedings subsequent to the mandate, is undoubtedly correct in the sense in which that expression was used, with reference to the doctrine of that case. Whatever had been formerly before the court, and was disposed of by its decree, was considered as finally disposed of; and the question of interest raised upon the execution of the mandate in that case, was in that predicament. But upon all proceedings to carry into effect the decree of the court, the original proceedings are always before the court, so far as they are necessary to determine any new points or rights in controversy between the parties, which were not terminated by the original decree. The court may, therefore, inspect the original proceedings, to ascertain the merits or demerits of the parties, so far as they bear on the new claims, and must decide upon the whole examination what its duty requires. In the present case, it is impossible to separate the stipulation from the other proceedings. It is unintelligible without reference to them. The court must inspect them, to guide it in its future acts, and to enable it to carry into effect the decree of the Supreme Court. That *decree re- [*443 stores the property generally as claimed by the libelant; but what that property is, in what predicament it is, and what are the means by which it is to be restored, must be ascertained, before the court can institute any farther proceedings.

Another preliminary question is, whether the subject-matter of these claims is, in this stage of the cause, open for discussion. All the claims of Mr. Burke might certainly have been brought forward and insisted upon in the original proceedings. If his right to the property was not established, still he might be entitled to equitable deductions for meliorations or charges; and if these claims were favored by the court, the decree of restitution would have been subject to these deductions. They would then have constituted a lien upon the property, and the Circuit Court must have enforced it. But no such claims were insisted upon in the written allegations, or even viva voce at the hearing; the omission was voluntary, and the decree of restitution passed in the most absolute and unconditional form. The consequences of now admitting them to be brought before this court by appeal, would be most inconvenient and mischievous in practice. It would encourage the grossest laches and delays. The party might lie by through the whole progress of the original cause until a final decree, holding the real owner out of his property, and securely enjoying, as in this case, the profits, and then start new claims for future investigation which would protract the final decision to an 444*] indefinite period. Such a course would have a tendency justly to bring into disrepute the administration of justice, and inflict upon the innocent all the evils of expensive litigation. We think, therefore, that upon principle, every existing claim which the party has omitted to make at the hearing upon the merits and before the final decree, is to be considered as waived by him, and is not to be entertained in any future proceedings; and when a decree has been made, which is in its own terms absolute, it is to be carried into effect according to those terms, and excludes all inquiry between the litigating parties as to liens or claims which might have been attached to it by the court, if they had been previously brought to its notice. These remarks apply as well to the claim for freight as the other items. Mr. Burke, as the importer of the goods, would, if the carrier ship had belonged to a mere stranger, have been directly responsible for the freight, and would have been entitled to bring it forward in the original suit as an equitable charge. It can make no difference in his favor, that he was, as he now asserts himself in his petition to be, a joint owner of the vessel with Mr. Forbes. Whether, as between himself and his co-proprietor, he would be liable to pay any freight, does not appear, for the petition is naked of any proofs, and he may have occupied only his own portion of the vessel. Nor is there any evidence adduced that Mr. Forbes was really a joint owner; and in his original claim, Mr. Burke expressly asserts the vessel to be his own, in terms which imply a sole pro- 445] prietary interest. *But without relying on these circumstances, it is sufficient to say that it is too late for Mr. Burke in any way to assert the claim for freight, and if payable at all, he must now bear the burthen occasioned by his own laches.

This view of the subject makes it wholly unnecessary to enter upon the inquiry how far Mr. Burke is an innocent possessor of the property in controversy, and, as such, entitled to equitable deductions and charges. The claim, whether a lien, or a mere equity, has been totally displaced by the unconditional decree of restitution.

The same doctrine applies to the claim of interest made by the libelant. The question was involved in the original proceedings, and the libel itself contains an express prayer for damages, as well as for restitution of the property. Damages are often given by way of interest for the illegal seizure and detention of property; and, indeed, in cases of tort, if given at all, interest partakes of the very nature of damages. The ground now assumed is, that interest ought to be given since the date of the stipulation, or, at all events, since the decree of restitution, because the claimant has had the use of the property during this period, and it is but a just compensation to the libelant for the delay and loss he has sustained by the dispossession. It might have been just and proper for the court below to have refused the delivery of the property upon stipulation, unless upon the express condition that the same should carry interest, if so decreed by the court. And, in cases of this nature, it appears *to us [*446 highly proper that such a clause should be inserted in the stipulation. But the present stipulation contains no such clause, and, therefore, so far as respects the principal and sureties, to decree it upon that, would be to include a liability not justified by its terms. It is true, that interest might be decreed against Mr. Burke personally, not as the stipulator, but as the claimant in the cause; but then it would be by way of damages for the detention or delay. In this view, it was a matter open for discussion upon the original appeal; and no interest having been then asked for or granted, the claim is finally at rest. What was matter formerly before the court cannot again be drawn into controversy.

We have considered these questions thus far upon principle. But they have been already decided by this court. The case of Rose v. Himely, 5 Cranch's Rep. 313, is directly in point. The authority of that case has not been in the slightest degree impugned, and, without overthrowing it, this court could not now entertain the present claims. We are not disposed to doubt the entire correctness of that adjudication.

The question in regard to the duties, admits of a very different consideration. The decree of restitution awards to the libelant the whole property in controversy, and nothing more. Upon the face of the proceedings it appears that the stipulation was taken for the appraised value of the property, including the duties paid to the United States by the claimant. The amount of *those duties never consti- [*447 tuted any part of the property of the libelant, or those for whom he acts. Neither he nor they have ever incurred the charge, or made the advance. And if it is now given to the libelant, it is a sum beyond the value of the property, which has been paid upon the importation without his aid, and without any injury to him or his principal. It is true, that in the hands of the claimant the property may be assumed to be worth the whole appraised value; but that value includes not only the value of the property, per se, but the amount of the duties already paid by the claimant. In receiving it, the claimant has received no more of the libelant's property than the sum, deducting the duties already paid. It has been said that the property was wrongfully brought to the United States by the claimant, and, therefore, he is not entitled to favor. This might be a satisfactory answer to any attempt of the claimant to charge the libelant with the duties as an equitable charge. But no such claim has been asserted; and if the court were now to decree to the libelant the whole sum in the stipulation, the decree in effect would require the claimant to pay the duties to the libelant, as well as to the government. The original decree purports no such thing It is confined to simple restitution of the property; and the proceeds substituted for that, are the net sum, deducting the duties; the market price, or appraised value, being compounded of the original value and the duties. DAY et al. v. CHISM.

In a declaration upon a covenant of warranty, it is necessary to allege substantially an eviction by title paramount; but no formal terms are prescribed in which the averment is to be made.

Where it was averred in such a declaration, "that the said O. had not a good and sufficient title to the said tract of land, and by reason thereof, the said plaintiffs were ousted and dispossessed of the said premises by due course of law," it was held sufficient as a substantial averment of an eviction by title paramount.

Where the plaintiffs declared in covenant both as heirs and devisees, without showing in particular how they were heirs, and without setting out the will, it was held not to be fatal on a general demurrer.

Such a defect may be amended under the 32d section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Tennessee.

*This cause was argued by Mr. Bibb [*450 for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Eaton for the defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of covenant brought by the heirs and devisees of Nathaniel Day, in the court for the seventh circuit, for the district of Tennessee, on a covenant contained in a deed from the defendant to the said Nathaniel Day, purporting to convey a tract of land therein mentioned. The declaration, which contains six counts, states the covenant in the fourth in the following words: That the said Obadiah Chism, the defendant, "then and there, by the said indenture, covenanted and agreed with the said Nathaniel Day, his heirs and assigns, to warrant and defend the title to the said premises against the claim of all and every other person whatsoever, as his own proper right in fee-simple." In the fifth count, the covenant alleged is, "to warrant and defend the land against all and every person whatever."

In some of the counts, the only breach assigned is want of title in the defendant. The fourth and fifth counts charge that "the said Obadiah, the defendant, hath not kept and performed his covenant so made with the said Nathaniel aforesaid, with the said Nathaniel in his life-time, nor with the plaintiffs since his death, but hath broken it, in this, that he hath not warranted and defended the title to said premises, described in said covenant, *against all and every person whatso- [*451 ever, to said Nathaniel Day, his heirs and assigns; and also in this, that the said Obadiah had no title to said tract of land, but it was vested in the state of Tennessee; and the said plaintiffs aver that by reason of the said want of title in said Obadiah, the said Nathaniel, in his life-time, and the plaintiffs, since his death, were unable to obtain possession thereof, or to derive any benefit therefrom; and also in this, that the said Obadiah had not a good and sufficient title to the said tract of land, and by reason thereof the said plaintiffs were ousted and dispossessed of the said premises by due course of law; and also in this, that the said Obadiah had no title to the said premises, but the same was in the state of North Carolina, by reason whereof the said Nathaniel, in his life-time, and the plaintiffs, since his death, were and are unable to obtain possession of the said premises.

The defendant demurred to the declaration, and assigned for cause of demurrer, that (1st) "it does not appear in and by the said declaration, any averment or allegation therein, that the said plaintiffs have been evicted by a title paramount to the title of the defendant; and (2d) the said declaration is, in other respects, defective, uncertain and informal."

The covenant stated in the declaration is, we think, a covenant of warranty, and not a covenant of seisin, or that the vendor has title. In an action on such a covenant, it is undoubtedly necessary to allege, substantially, an eviction by title paramount, but we do not think 452*] that any *formal words are prescribed, in which this allegation is to be made. It is not necessary to say, in terms, that the plaintiff had been evicted by a title paramount to that of the defendants. In this case, we think such an eviction is averred substantially. The plaintiffs aver "that the said Obadiah had not a good and sufficient title to the said tract of land; and by reason thereof, the said plaintiffs were ousted and dispossessed of the said premises by due course of law." This averment, we think, contains all the facts which constitute an eviction by title paramount. The person who, from want of title, is dispossessed and ousted by due course of law, must, we think, be evicted by title paramount.

We think, then, that the special cause assigned for the demurrer will not sustain it.

There are other defects in the declaration which are supposed by the counsel for the defendants in error to be sufficient to support the judgment. The plaintiffs claim both as heirs and devisees, and do not show in particular how they are heirs, nor do they set out the will.

It is undoubtedly true, that their title cannot be in both characters, and that the will, if it passes the estate differently from what it would pass at law, defeats their title as heirs. But a man may devise lands to his heirs, and the statement that they are his heirs, as well as his devisees, though not a strictly artificial mode of declaring, is an error of form and not of substance. Of the same character is, we think, the omission to show how the plaintiffs are heirs, or 453*] to set out the will. Although *in the case of Denham v. Stephenson, 1 Salk. 355; 6 Mod. 241, the court says "that where H sues as heir, he must show his pedigree, and coment heres, for it lies in his proper knowledge," the court does not say that the omission to do this would be fatal on a general demurrer, or that it is an error in substance. The plaintiff must show how he is heir on the trial; and the 32d sec. of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, applies, we think, to omissions of this description. The judgment may be given, "according to the right of the cause, and matter in law," although the declaration may not show whether the plaintiff is the son or brother of his ancestor, or may not set out the will at large. An averment that he is the heir or the devisee, avers substantially a valid title, which it is incumbent on him to prove at the trial.

The declaration presents another objection, respecting which the court has felt considerable difficulty. In the same count, breaches are assigned, which are directly repugnant to each other. The plaintiffs allege that from the defect of title in the vendor, they have not been able to obtain possession of the premises; and also that they have been dispossessed of those premises by due course of law. These averments are in opposition to each other. But the allegation that possession has never been obtained is immaterial, because not a breach of the covenant, and, the majority of the court is disposed to think, may be disregarded on a general demurrer.

*It is the opinion of the court that [*454 the fourth and fifth counts, however informal, have substance enough in them to be maintained against a general demurrer, and that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. It will be in the power of the Circuit Court to allow the parties to amend their pleadings.

Judgment reversed accordingly.

M'DOWELL v. PEYTON et al.

The following entry, "J. T. enters 10,000 acres of land, on part of a treasury warrant, No. 9739, to be laid off in one or more surveys, lying between Stoner's Fork and Hingston's Fork, about six or seven miles nearly north-east of Harrod's Lick, at two white-ash saplings from one root, with the letter K marked on each of them, standing at the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork, on the east side of the branch then running a line from said ash saplings, south 45 degrees east, 1,600 poles; thence extending from each end of this line north 45 degrees east, down the branch, until a line nearly parallel to the beginning line shall include the quantity of vacant land, exclusive of prior claims," is not a valid entry, there being no proof that the "two white-ash saplings from one root, with the letter K marked on each of them, standing at the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork," had acquired sufficient notoriety to constitute a valid call for the beginning of an entry, without further aid than is afforded by the information that the land lies between those forks.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This cause was argued by Mr. Wickiffe for *the appellant, and by Mr. Talbot for [*455 the respondents.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree pronounced in the court of the United States for the seventh circuit and district of Kentucky, dismissing a bill brought by the plaintiff, to obtain a conveyance for a tract of land in possession of the defendant under an elder grant, to which the plaintiff claims to have the superior equitable title. The defendant rests on his patent; and as the entry under which the plaintiff claims was made before that patent issued, the cause depends essentially on the validity of the entry. It is in these words:

Dec. 24th, 1782.—"John Tabb enters 10,000 acres of land, on part of a treasury warrant, No. 9739, to be laid off in one or more surveys, lying between Stoner's Fork and Hingston's Fork, beginning about six or seven miles nearly north-east of Harrod's Lick, at two white-ash saplings from one root, with the letter K marked on each of them, standing at the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork, on the east side of the branch; then running a line from said ash saplings, south 45 degrees east, 1,600 poles; thence extending from each end of this line north 45 degrees east, down the branch, until a line nearly parallel to the beginning line shall include the quantity of vacant land, exclusive of prior claims."

The counsel for the defendant insists that 456*] this *entry is invalid, because it does not describe the land with that certainty which is required by the land law of Kentucky. They contend that the description given to find the beginning is false, and calculated to mislead a subsequent locator.

Harrod's Lick, Stoner's Fork and Hingston's Fork are proved to have been objects well known by those names at the date of the entry, and serve as a general description of the country in which the land lies; but it is not shown that the two white-ash saplings from one root, with the letter K marked on each of them, standing at the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork, had acquired sufficient notoriety to constitute a valid call for the beginning of an entry, without further aid than is afforded by the information that the land lies between these forks. Its identity is proved, but the decisions on the act of 1779 require notoriety as well as identity. The plaintiffs' counsel maintain that there are descriptive words in the entry sufficient to bring a person, using reasonable diligence, and searching for this beginning, near enough to it to find the two white-ash saplings. Those descriptive words are: "Beginning about six or seven miles nearly north-east of Harrod's Lick, at two white-ash saplings, etc., standing at the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork, on the east side of the branch." The information which is to guide a subsequent locator to the white-ash saplings, is the course and distance from Harrod's Lick, and the forks of a west branch of Hingston's Fork.

A survey was made by the order of the 457*] court, *and the plat shows that the saplings mentioned in the entry are three miles and one hundred and forty-five poles from Harrod's Lick, and that the course which leads to them is north 53 degrees east. The real distance, then, is about one-half the distance called for in the entry, and the course varies eight degrees.

To obviate the objection founded on this variance, the plaintiff alleges the distinction between the descriptive and locative calls of an entry. The purpose of the first is to bring the subsequent locator into the neighborhood of the land he means to avoid, and that of the second is to find the land already appropriated, so as to enable him to appropriate the adjacent residuum. The precision, therefore, which is necessary in a locative call, has never been required in that which is descriptive.

The correctness of this principle is not controverted. Still, it is necessary that the descriptive calls should designate the place so nearly, as to give information which would enable a subsequent locator of ordinary intelligence to find the land previously entered, by making a reasonable search. It will not be pretended that in such a case as this, exactness in distance or in course would be indispensable to the validity of the entry; but distance and course are both intended to lead to the ash saplings, and, if unaided by other description, could alone be regarded by the person who should search for them. He would pursue a north-east course at least six miles from Harrod's Lick; and not finding a western branch 458*] *of Hingston, would search for such a stream in every direction, from the place to which he was conducted by his course and distance. In an unexplored country, covered with cane and other wood, it would be extremely difficult to find an object far from being conspicuous, at a distance of two or three miles, and would require more time and labor than ought to be imposed on a person desirous of appropriating the adjacent residuum. The counsel for the plaintiffs would not attempt to support such an entry; but they contend that the error in both course and distance is corrected by other parts of the entry, and by the situation of objects to which the attention is directed.

The land is required to lie between Stoner and Hingston; and the person who should pursue a north-east direction from Harrod's Lick, in search of it, would strike Hingston at the distance of five and one-eighth miles. He would, consequently, know that he had passed the ash saplings, and would return in search of them. His search would be directed to a western branch of Hingston, at the forks of which the two white-ash saplings would be found. It is contended that this description would lead the inquirer to the mouth of Clear Creek, proceeding up which, he would find at one of its forks the white-ash saplings, at which Tabb's entry begins.

If this statement was strictly accurate, there would certainly be great force in the argument founded on it. With certain information that Clear Creek was called for in the entry, and that *its beginning was at a place [*459 so well described as to be known when seen, it might not, perhaps, be too much to require the person desirous of acquiring adjacent land to trace that creek to the forks at which the saplings stand. But the inquirer is not directed to Clear Creek. He is directed to a western branch of Hingston, and two branches empty into that stream, the one above and the other below the point, at which a north-east course from Harrod's Lick would strike it, and about equi distant from that point. There is no expression in the entry which would, in the first instance, direct the inquirer to Clear Creek, on which the saplings stand, in preference to Brush Creek, on which they do not stand. His attention would be rather directed to Brush Creek, by a circumstance which is undoubtedly entitled to consideration, and has always received it in Kentucky. It is this: Clear Creek had, at the time this entry was made, an appropriate name, which distinguished it from the other western branches of Hingston; and a locater, intending to place his beginning on that creek, might be reasonably expected to call it by its appropriate name, and not to refer to it by a general description which it possessed in common with many other streams. The inquirer, therefore, would proceed, in the first instance, to Brush Creek, because that creek would be designated, when Tabb's entry was made, only as a western branch of Hingston. The plaintiff contends that this error would soon be corrected, because the entry calls for a north-east course to run down the branch, and Brush *Creek bends so [*460 much at a small distance from its mouth, so as to satisfy the inquirer that this could not be the stream intended by the entry. With the plat before us, we can readily make this discovery. But a person unacquainted with the course of Brush Creek, would not make it until he had proceeded up it a considerable distance. He could not know, till he had done so, that the creek would not again change its course, and pursue a south-western direction. If, after making this discovery, he should go to Clear Creek, he would find its first course from Hingston a very discouraging one; nor would its course be adapted to the call of the entry until he came within a very short distance of the fork at which the saplings stand. Add to this, Clear Creek appears to fork several times before reaching the saplings; and at each of these forks, an accurate search must be made before the inquirer would proceed farther up the creek.

The course and distance from Harrod's Lick, mentioned in the entry, are calculated to mislead a person desirous of knowing the land it designates; and although these errors might unquestionably be corrected by other parts of the description, which would conduct us with reasonable certainty to the beginning, it may well be doubted whether the whole of this entry, taking all its parts together, and combining them, contains such reasonable certainty. Had it been now, for the first time, brought before a court for adjudication, it is liable to such great and serious objections that 461*] it would most probably be *pronounced invalid. But the highest court of Kentucky has already given this decision; and this court has always conformed to that construction of the legislative acts of a state, which has been given by its own courts. This general principle is entitled to peculiar consideration, when it applies to an act which regulates titles to land.

The case of Cochran v. Thomas, reported in Hardin, 261, depended on the validity of this entry, and in that case, the court decided against its validity. The authority of this decision has been questioned on several grounds.

1st. It was made by only two judges, when the court consisted of four, the others being interested.

Had a contrary opinion been avowed by both or either of the other judges, or by any judge since this decision was made, its authority would undoubtedly be much impaired, if not entirely annulled. But no such contrary opinion has been expressed, although the decree in Couchman v. Thomas was pronounced in the spring term of 1808. Since then it was made by a tribunal, which was at the time legally constituted, and has remained unquestioned for sixteen years. This court must admit its authority in like manner as if it had received the formal approbation of a majority of the judges.

2d. A second objection is, that it is a single decision; and the courts of Kentucky do not consider themselves as bound by a single decision, if its principles are believed, on more ma- 462*] ture *deliberation, to be unsound. Those courts, we are informed, have often given different decisions on the same entry, when brought before them in a different case, prepared with more care.

That different decisions will be often made on the same entry, can excite no surprise when it is recollected that the validity of an entry does not depend entirely on its own terms, but on the application of those terms to external objects, and the general notoriety of those objects, as proved by the testimony in each case. If in one case, the party claiming under an entry had neglected to prove the notoriety of some material call, by the notoriety of which its certainty was to be established, in consequence of which defect the entry was declared to be invalid, this could constitute no reason for pronouncing the same decision in another case, between different parties, who had been careful to bring before the court ample testimony of the fact on which the cause must depend. This difference of decision would constitute no difference of principle.

But the court can perceive no new testimony in the case under consideration, which can vary it to the advantage of the plaintiff, from the case of Couchman v. Thomas.

It may be very true that a single decision cannot be permitted to shake settled principles, and that this court ought not to consider one judgment as overturning well established doctrines, and introducing a new course of opinion. But, certainly, a decision on the very point which has remained for many years unquestioned, has the *first impression in [*463 its favor, and must be proved to overturn established principles before this court can disregard it.

The land law of Kentucky requires that the holder of a land warrant shall locate it "so specially and precisely that others may be enabled with certainty to locate other warrants on the adjacent residuum."

In construing this provision of the law, courts have always inclined to support entries, where this inclination could be indulged consistently with the provision itself; but they have always supposed a reasonable degree of precision and certainty to be indispensable to the validity of every entry.

They have laid down great general principles, in the application of which to particular cases, the shades of difference are as numerous and as nice as in the application of the principle that the intention of the testator shall govern, to the words of a will.

The description of the land to be acquired, which every entry must contain, may be divided into general and special. The general description must be such as to bring the holder of a warrant to be located into the neighborhood of the land already appropriated, and such as to enable him to find that land with reasonable diligence; the special description, or, in the technical language of the country, the locative calls of the entry, must be such as to ascertain and identify the land. All the cases recognize these principles, and claim to come within them.

*The counsel for the plaintiff has [*464 cited many cases in which entries have been sustained, although the whole description they contain has not been precisely accurate.

The court has examined these cases, and is of opinion that in all of them, although the description may be in part defective and uncertain, such defect and uncertainty have been cured by other calls, which afford all the information, that could be reasonably required. An example of this is furnished by the case of Taylor v. Kincaid (Hardin, 82). The entry was made "on the head of Willis Lee's branch, four miles from Leesburg," and was sustained, although the head of the branch was, in truth, eleven miles from Leesburg. In this case, however, the mistake in the distance was corrected by the notoriety of the object itself. Willis Lee's branch, at the time, and before the location was made, was so notorious that the inquirer could not be misled by the mistake in the distance. That a part of the description which is erroneous, may be discarded, if the object called for is itself so notorious that it requires no aid from description, and cannot be mistaken; and that such part will not vitiate the entry, may be admitted, without impugning the judgment in the case of Couchman v. Thomas. Tabb's entry contains no descriptive call which would conduct the inquirer to the white-ash saplings he is in search of, and the saplings themselves were not objects of sufficient notoriety to cure the defects in the general description.

DARBY'S LESSEE v. MAYER et al.

Quære. How far a will of lands, duly proved and recorded in one state, so as to be evidence in the courts of that state, is thereby rendered evidence in the courts of another state (provided the record on its face shows that it possesses all the solemnities required by the laws of the state where the land lies), under the 4th art., sec. 1, of the constitution of the United States.

The local law of Maryland, as to the effect of evidence of the probate of a will of lands, in an action of ejectment, is the same with the common law.

A duly certified copy of a will of lands, and the probate thereof, in the Orphan's Court of Maryland is not evidence in an action of ejectment, of a devise of lands in Tennessee.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of West Tennessee.

This cause was argued by Mr. Bibb and Mr. Isaacs for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. White and Mr. D. Hoffman for the defendants in error. But as the judgment turned only on a single point, and does not finally dispose of the cause, it has not been thought necessary to report the argument.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment, in which the present plaintiff was plaintiff in the court below. His title is derived through a patent to one John Rice, and successive conveyances down to himself, *which it is immateri- [*466 al to recapitulate, since no question arises upon this part of the evidence. The defense set up was the statute of limitations, and in order to bring himself within its provisions, the defendant received the patent under which the plaintiff claims, as the patent for his own land, and undertakes to connect himself with it. This gave rise to a variety of exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the evidence offered by the defendant for this purpose, to which the defendant replies, that should he have failed in establishing a connection by a chain of title, he has complied with the statute notwithstanding, by proving his possession within the patent issued to Rice, which, he contends, is all the connection with a patent which the law requires.

One of the grounds of exception made by the plaintiff is, that the evidence of the defendant proves his possession to be upon a tract of land essentially different from that which the patent covers. And not a little difficulty has existed on this part of the case, to understand the counsel when discussing the question of identity. All this has arisen from omitting to have the locus in quo established by a survey; an omission to which the court takes this opportunity to express its disapprobation. It is true that the case upon this bill of exceptions can be disposed of without such a survey, but great facility would have been afforded by a survey, in understanding the discussion, which, without it, was scarcely intelligible. It is very obvious, when we refer to the patent to Rice under which the plaintiff claims, *and the entry to Ramsey through which [*467 the defendant deduces title, both of which are made parts of the bill of exceptions, that they do not describe the same land. On the contrary, that to Rice, calling for the entry to NOTE.—The title to land by devise can be acquired only under a will duly proved according to the state or country where the land lies. The probate of one state or country is of no validity as affecting the title to lands in another. McCormick v. Sullivant, ante, 192.

The judgments of tribunals cannot, as a general rule, operate beyond the territorial limits of the government or nation to which such tribunals belong. Platt v. Oliver, 2 McLean, 267.

The title to real property, and all modes of disposing of it, must be exclusively governed by the laws of the country where it is situated. U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch, 115; Clark v. Graham, 6 Wheat. 577; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 543; Kerr v. Morn, 9 Wheat. 565; Oakley v. Bennett, 11 How. 33; Soc'y, etc., v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 105; See further the notes to Elmendorf v. Taylor, ante 152, and to Clark v. Graham, 6 Wheat. 577.

A will regularly proved in another state, in strict conformity with the laws of that state, acquires, if it possess the other legal requisites, a binding efficacy in Virginia, so that it may be admitted to record. Carter v. Cutting, 8 Cranch, 251.

It is not necessary that an executor of a will, made in Virginia, devising to him land in Kentucky, should take out letters testamentary in Kentucky to enable him to maintain ejectment for it. Doe v. McFarland, 9 Cranch, 151.

The copy of a will of lands lying in Pennsylvania, made in New York, proved before the surrogate of New York by one of the subscribing witnesses who also proved that the other two witnesses attested the same in the presence of the testator, authenticated under the seal of the surrogate's office, and entered in the office of the register general of Pennsylvania, is not admissible in evidence in Pennsylvania. In all cases, no matter where the will is proved, if it concern land in Pennsylvania, it must be proved by two witnesses. Hylton v. Brown, 1 Wash. C. C. 204.

Where a suit in one state brings incidentally in question the title to land held under devise in another state, it is not necessary that there should be probate of the will in the state where the suit is brought, before it can be used as evidence of title. Slack v. Walcott, 3 Mas. 508.

A testamentary paper executed in a foreign country, although executed so as to give it the effect of a last will by the foreign law, cannot be made the foundation of a suit for a legacy in the courts of this country, until it has received probate here in the courts having the peculiar jurisdiction over wills. Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. 169.

Ramsay as its eastern boundary, must necessarily lie without it.

However, we are of opinion that we are not now at liberty to notice this inconsistency. The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff proved the defendant in possession of the land granted to Rice, and the defendant proved himself in possession of the land entered to Ramsay, both concurring in the fact that the land in the defendant's possession was the land in controversy; from which it certainly results that Rice held a patent for Ramsay's entry. But the defendant having no patent, the other has, of course, the legal estate in him, which may be barred by the defendant's possession, if he brings himself within the provisions of the statute.

In order to connect himself with the patent, the defendant proved a sale of the inchoate interest of John Rice to one Solomon Kitts, and the next link in his title depended upon the will of Solomon Kitts. To prove that Kitts devised the land to the trustees through whom defendant made title, a copy and probate of the will of Kitts was produced in evidence, duly certified from the Orphan's Court of Baltimore county, Maryland, in which, it seems, the will had been recently proved and recorded. This evidence was excepted to, but the court overruled the exception, and it went to the jury.

468*] *The question is, whether the evidence thus offered was legal evidence of a devise of land.

The common law doctrine on this subject no one contests; the ordinary's probate was no evidence of the execution of the will in ejectment. Where the will itself was in existence, and could be produced, it was necessary to produce it; when the will was lost, or could not be procured to be produced in evidence, secondary evidence was necessarily resorted to, according to the nature of the case. But whatever proof was made, was required to be made before the court that tried the cause; the proof before the ordinary being ex-parte, and the heir-at-law having had no opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses; neither were the same solemnities required to admit the will to probate as were indispensable to give it validity as a devise of real estate. At first it was a question of controversy between the common law and ecclesiastical courts, whether a will, containing a devise of lands, should not be precluded from probate, although containing a bequest of personalty also. And the question was one of serious import, since the common law courts required the production of the original, whereas the consequence of probate was, that the original should be consigned to the archives of the court that proved it. This was at length compromised, and the practice introduced of delivering out the will, when necessary, upon security to return it.

Upon general principles, there is no question that lands in Tennessee must, in all re-469*] spects, be *subject to the land laws of Tennessee. Their laws affecting devises, and the rules of their courts respecting evidence in ejectment, must be the law of this case, as far as the constitution of the United States does not control the one or the other.

With regard to the modification under which the right of devising may be exercised, there is no question that the power of the state is unlimited; and wills of realty, wherever executed, must conform to the laws of Tennessee. The right of determining whether its laws have been complied with in this respect, is a necessary result from the power of passing those laws. But in this respect, it has been supposed that the right of the states is in some measure controlled by that article of the constitution which declares "that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state." And hence that a will of lands duly recorded in one state, so as to be evidence in the courts of that state, is rendered evidence thereby in the court of every other state; provided the record, on the face of it, shows that it possessed the solemnities required by the laws of the state where the land lies.

As this is a question of some delicacy, as it relates to devises of lands, the court passes it over at present, being induced to adopt the opinion that the rule could not be applied to this case, since the laws of Maryland do not make the probate here offered evidence in a land-cause in the courts of that state.

*That the law of Maryland, with re- [*470
gard to the evidence of a devise in ejectment, is the common law of England, is clearly recognized in the case of Smith's Lessee v. Steele (1 Harris and M'Henry, 419). In that case, as in this, a copy of the will and probate were offered in evidence, and was supported by proof of the loss of the original will from the office of probates. Yet the whole argument turns, not on the admission of the copy and probate per se, but whether admissible at all to prove the existence and contents of the original will. And the court declare, in permitting it to be read in evidence to the jury, that they are at liberty to find for or against the original will, not holding them bound from the production of the probate to find for the plaintiffs. It is observable also in that case, that it is yielded in argument throughout, that the admission of the probate could only be sustained on the idea that the acts of 1704 and 1715, now no more in force, permitted the ordinary to take probate of wills of land. But it has been supposed that the Maryland law of probates of 1798 has, by express enactment, made such probates evidence in their own courts. And had it been shown that such had been the established construction of that law, and the practice of the state courts under it, this court would not have hesitated to relinquish their own views on the correct construction to be given to that clause.

As it is, we must pursue the suggestions of our own minds with regard to the legal construction of the act.

*The clause alluded to is the 4th [*471
sec., ch. 2, art. 3, of the act in question, and is in these words: "An attested copy, under the seal of office, of any will, testament or codicil recorded in any office authorized to record the same, shall be admitted in evidence in any court of law or equity, provided that the execution of the original will or codicil be subject to be contested until a probate hath been had according to this act."

It is true that the generality of the terms in the first lines of this clause is such as would, if unrestricted by the context, embrace wills of lands. It is also true that the previous chapter in the same article prescribes the formalities necessary to give validity to devises of real estate; it is further true that the previous sections of the second chapter indicate the means, and impose the duty of delivering up wills of all descriptions to the register of the Court of Probates, for safe keeping, after the death of the testator, and until they shall be demanded by some person authorized to demand them for the purpose of proving them.

But it is equally true that the act does not authorize the registering of any will without probate. Nor does it, in any one of its provisions, relate to the probate of any wills, except wills of goods and chattels.

The clause recited makes evidence of such wills only as are recorded in the offices of courts authorized to record them. But when the power of taking probate is expressly limited to the probate of wills of goods and chat-472*] tels, we see not *with what propriety the meaning of the clause in question can be extended to wills of any other description. The Orphan's Court may take probates of wills though they affect lands, provided they also affect goods and chattels; but the will, nevertheless, is conclusively established only as to the personalty. Unless the words be explicit and imperative to the contrary, the construction must necessarily conform to the existing laws of the state on the subject of wills of real estate. And when the power of taking probates is confined to wills of personalty, we think the construction of the clause recited must be limited by the context.

We are therefore of opinion that there was nothing in the law of Maryland which could, under the constitution, make the document offered to prove this will per se evidence in a land cause. Nor does there appear to exist any rule of law in Tennessee which could make such a document good evidence under the laws of that state.

Since, therefore, the charge of the court was general in favor of the defendants, and the effect of each particular piece of evidence upon the minds of the jury cannot be discriminated, this opinion disposes of the whole cause.

The case presents several other, and very important questions, but the court will at present decline remarking on them.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

J. MANRO et al.

v.

JOSEPH ALMEIDA, and the goods, chattels and credits of the said Almeida.

The courts of the United States, proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, have jurisdiction in cases of maritime torts, in personam as well as in rem.

The courts of the United States, proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, may issue the process of attachment to compel appearance, both in cases of maritime torts and contracts.

Under the process act of 1792, c. 137 (XXXVI.), s. 2, the proceedings in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the courts of the United States are to be according to the modified admiralty practice in our own country engrafted upon the British practice; and it is not a sufficient reason for rejecting a particular process, which has been constantly used in the admiralty courts of this country, that it has fallen into desuetude in England.

The process by attachment may issue, wherever the defendant has concealed himself or absconded from the country, and the goods to be attached are within the jurisdiction of the admiralty.

It may issue against his goods and chattels, and against his credits and effects in the hands of third persons.

The remedy by attachment in the admiralty, in maritime cases, applies even where the same goods are liable to the process of foreign attachment, issuing from the courts of common law.

It applies to the case of a piratical capture, and the civil remedy is not merged in the criminal offense.

In case of default, the property attached may be condemned to answer the demand of the libelant.

It is not necessary that the property to be attached should be specified in the libel.

It seems, that an attachment cannot issue without an express order of the judge, but it may be issued simultaneously with the monition; and where the attachment issued in this manner, and in pursuance of the prayer of the libel, this court will presume that it was regularly issued.

*APPEAL from the Circuit Court of [*474 Maryland.

This was a libel filed in the District Court by the appellants, resident merchants of Baltimore, against the respondent, Almeida, charging him with having forcibly and piratically taken from on board a certain vessel, off the capes of the Chesapeake, and within the territorial limits of the United States, the sum of $5,000, in specie, belonging to the appellants, and converted the same to his own use, without bringing it into any port or place for adjudication. The libel further stated that the said Almeida had absconded from the United States, and fled beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and that no means of redress remained for the libelants, unless by process of attachment against the goods, chattels and credits of the said Almeida, which were also about to be removed, by his orders, to foreign parts. The libel also prayed a personal monition, and likewise viis et modis, and that the respondent might answer the premises on oath, and be compelled to pay the appellants the said sum of $5,000 and damages; and in default thereof, that his goods, chattels and credits, when attached, be condemned to answer the premises, etc. The marshal returned, that he had attached certain goods and chattels of the said Almeida; that the said Almeida was not to be found within the district, and that he had left a copy of the monition at the late dwelling house of Almeida, and had affixed it at the public exchange, *and on the [*475 mast of the vessel containing the goods and chattels attached by him. But although the transcript of the record contained a petition for the sale of the attached goods, and an order of the court denying the prayer of the petition, yet it did not appear by the record by what authority the attachment issued. But it appeared, by the admission of counsel at the hearing, that the attachment had been issued by the clerk of the District Court, as a process of course, without any particular order of the judge. The respondent appeared by a proctor of the court, and demurred to the libel. On the argument of the demurrer, the District Court dismissed the libel, and ordered that the goods, chattels, and credits attached, should be restored with costs. This decree being affirmed, pro forma, by the Circuit Court, the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Mayer, for the appellants, argued, (1) that on principle the process of attachment must be considered as peculiarly applicable in admiralty proceedings. As the court acts habitually in rem, the proceeding by attachment very naturally became a part of its practice. Hence it was often resorted to in early times in England; but the courts of common law, influenced by an illiberal and jealous spirit, have graudally encroached upon the admiralty judicature; and, we may readily believe, as we are told, that it has fallen into 476*] desuetude *in that county.[1] But this does not prove that its legal existence is extinguished. It is still in use on the European continent, whence the local customs of London and Exeter were also derived; the principle being, that persons are to be reached by justice through the medium of their property, as well as by direct proceedings in personam; and though there are some exceptions to the application of this principle, yet it is universally applied to the case of absconding debtors.[2] Contrary to the opinion of Huberus, the proceeding by attachment was known to the civil law, and is expressly provided for by the Digest, in the case of an absconding defendant.

2. It has been said, that if the proceeding by attachment, in the admiralty, be applicable to cases of contract, it cannot properly be applied to a tort such as the present. But there is no authority to sustain such a distinction. In Clerke's Praxis no distinction is laid down between tort and debt; but the course of proceeding is intimated in that book as applicable to both; and the language in 2 Bro. 434, includes all grievances and claims whether of contract or tort.[3] In this country, however, it has been expressly adjudged to extend to tort as well as debt.[4] It may be admitted that where the tort 477*] *is of so indefinite a character that it can be reduced to no certain estimate, attachment will not lie. But here there is an obvious standard for determining the amount of the wrong, and liquidating the damages. The property taken consisted of specie dollars. Where a tort can be thus defined, attachments have been allowed even from the courts of common law.[5] Res non per se invicem sed per pecuniam estimatur, et non pecunia per res. Even before the statute of Marlbridge, for remedy in excessive distresses where money was taken in such cases, trespass would lie; because money is the measure of its own value, and of every wrong concerning it.[6] There is, then, here, as much certainty in the demand, from the nature of the wrong, as is required in debt. The appellants do not sue as for a "tort," by that name; but they state their complaint, and leave it to the court to give it the benefit of such technical forms as are appropriate to the case. Even at common law, they might have devested their claim of all the formal characteristics of tort, and given it the qualities of contract and the certainty of debt. The wrong concerning money exclusively, they might have brought indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received, instead of trespass for money taken and carried away. A court of admiralty, with its characteristic liberality, will regard their claim as *having assumed [*478 this technical form, if it be necessary for the purposes of justice.

3. Even if the process issued irregularly in this case, for want of a previous special application to the judge, it is now too late to object to the irregularity, since the appearance of the defendant cures all formal defects in the process.[7] But the equitable maxim, that what ought to be done will be considered as done, is applicable in a court of admiralty; and if the claim be so verified as that the process of attachment ought to have issued, the court will consider it as having duly issued. Quod fieri non debit factum valet, is a maxim applicable to the omission of acts merely directory and formal in their nature. It may be that the course of the English High Court of Admiralty requires a previous application to the judge to authorize the issuing an attachment, but such is not the practice in the United States. The irregularity might have been taken advantage of by an exception, in the nature of a plea in abatement, or by a motion to set aside the process, but not upon demurrer, as here attempted.

4. This is a complaint cognizable on the instance side of the court, and not of prize jurisdiction. The libel alleges a capture within the territorial jurisdiction of this country, and, therefore, a violation of its neutrality. It is then not a case of ordinary belligerent capture, involving the rights of war, and requiring the cognizance *of the prize court. A mere [*479 maritime tort is out of the sphere of the prize jurisdiction, which is confined to captures jure belli. The libel here charges a piratical taking, and not a capture jure belli. The act of 1794, c. 50, s. 6, authorizes the district courts to take cognizance of all cases of capture within our waters. It brings them within the civil or instance jurisdiction of the admiralty, and does not consider such cases as subjects of prize jurisdiction, which had already been vested in the district courts.

5. The civil remedy in this case is not merged in the piracy charged as the wrong of which the appellants complain.[8] That doctrine only applies to cases of felony and treason; and takes its rise from the policy of the ancient common law, to compel the despoiled party to prosecute his appeal for robbery, and to prevent the compounding of felonies. Piracy is not felony at common law, nor has it all the common law incidents of felony, although in some cases it is expressly declared by statute to be felony, although the stat. 28 Hen. VIII. ch. 15, makes piracy triable according to the course of the common law, yet it has not been interpreted to place it on the footing, and give it the technical qualities, of felony. A pardon of felonies, since this statute, does not, ex vi termini, include piracy.[1] The act of Congress goes no farther, 480*] in identifying *piracy with felony, than the statute of Henry does. An attachment against a pirate's goods, for a robbery committed by him, was known to the earlier periods of the law, and there was a writ from chancery to authorize it.[2] But it is clear that the doctrine of merger cannot be applied to the case of a pirate absconding from justice, and where the individual sufferer cannot prosecute him criminally. Such is understood to be the recently adjudged law in England, even in respect to a felony at common law.

6. It was unnecessary that the attachment should specify the goods to be attached. No rule of practice prescribes it, and no principle of convenience requires it. In the analogous case of distringas on mesne process at common law, no such specification is made. The party whose goods are attached may release them by appearing and giving security; and if he suffers them to be condemned and sold by default, no more of the proceeds will be decree to the libelant than is sufficient to satisfy his demand.

7. Nor is the locality of the territory or jurisdiction within which the property is attached material to the validity of the attachment, it being seized in the exercise of the admiralty judicature upon a subject within its established jurisdiction, and the property taken, or the right to it, not being the immediate object of the suit, but only incidental to its prosecution. Clerke's Praxis (pt. 2, tit. 28) 481*] does, indeed, speak of *goods within the ebb and flow of the tide, or on the sea, being subject to the attachment; but it evidently alludes to these instances only by way of exemplification, not of restriction. This is also evident from tit. 32, which authorizes the attachment of the defendant's goods and credits in the hands of a third person, without restriction as to locality.

Mr. Taney, contra, argued, (1) that a civil suit could not be maintained for the injury complained of in the libel. The remedy is here sought in personam by a suit in the Instance Court. The attachment is a mere ancillary process to compel appearance. The property is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and this is a proceeding against other property to compel an appearance. The wrong charged in the libel is a piracy. Can this be treated as a private wrong? There is no case in the records of the English admiralty to authorize such a proceeding, and both principle and analogy are against it. The absence of all authority in adjudged cases is a strong argument that it is not law. It is said that piracy is not treason nor felony. In England it was treason, and is felony. It has been such since the stat. 25 Edw. III., c. 2.[3] The goods of pirates, not belonging to others, are forfeited to the crown, as in felony.[4] How, then, can these goods be *made liable to satisfy the damages [*482 sustained by a private party?

But it is said that the injured party may waive the tort, and treat it as a contract. The only case where this may be done, is where, on a conversion of the plaintiff's goods, and a subsequent sale and receipt of the goods, the plaintiff may ratify what is done, and consider the goods as having been received by his authority. But that is in the case of a private tort, which may be waived; a wrong to the public cannot be waived. The authority of Dr. Browne is express, that in such a case the remedy is either criminally, as for a public crime, or in the prize court, as for a wrongful taking as prize.[5]

2. If the appellants can maintain a civil suit in such a case, can they do it in this form of proceeding? Will an attachment from the admiralty lie against the goods of an absent or absconding debtor? The power of proceeding in this manner once existed, and was analogous to the proceeding by foreign attachment according to the custom of London; but has long since been disused in England,[6] and, like many other usages in the admiralty, has become obsolete.[7] But the foreign attachment, according to the custom of London, only applied to cases of contract; and Sir L. Jenkins claims the admiralty jurisdiction to be exercised in this manner only *in cases of contract.[8] The prac- [*483 tice, as it is laid down by Clerke, is plainly confined to contracts. The caption of tit 28, part 1, is "of the warrant to be impetrated in rem, where the debtor absconds," etc. And tit. 32 states that "sometimes the person, who, by loan, or other maritime contract, is indebted to another," etc., and then authorizes an attachment of the credits or goods of the debtor in the hands of a third person, upon the principle laid down in the code, that debitor creditoris est debitor creditori creditoris; all which evidently implies that the whole proceeding is confined to matters of debt and contract.[9]

Although the proceeding by attachment has been occasionally resorted to in this country, yet it cannot be said to have gained a legal footing; and it would be an extremely inconvenient practice in our divided jurisdiction, where there may be as many different attachments issued at the same time as there are districts in the Union. But, to prevent the abuses to which it is liable, it is indispensably necessary that this process should only issue by an express order of the court. There is no precedent for its issuing of course, and as it cannot issue without an affidavit, the sufficiency of the matter contained in the affidavit, and the libel, are fit subjects for the determination of the judge, and ought not to be confided to the discretion of a mere ministerial *officer, such as the clerk. So, [*484 also, the property to be attached should be specifically stated in the warrant. This is required by Clerke, in the passages already cited. Tit. 28 authorizes "a warrant to be impetrated to this effect, viz., to attach such goods or such ship of D, the defendant, in whose hands soever they may be; and to cite the said D, specially as the owner, and all others who claim any right or title to them," etc. These errors were not cured by the defendant's appearance, because, if we resort to the analogy of common law proceeding, his appearance dissolved the attachment; and, in the present case, he appeared under protest, for the purpose of contesting the regularity of the proceedings.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this cause sets out the libel, the demurrer, and the decision of the court upon the demurrer. So far the case is consistent and intelligible; but the record contains, also, a petition for the sale of certain attached goods, a survey of the goods, and a decision against the petition, but no exhibition of the process or mode by which these goods came into the custody of the marshal. As the decision of the court sustains the demurrer, we are left at a loss, upon the record, to discover how process of attachment came to be issued. To obtain such process is the very prayer of the libel, and the decision of the court is against that prayer.

All the solution that the case presents, is to 485*] be *found in the argument of counsel, and their mutual admissions.

The clerk, it seems, issued the attachment as process of course, and the respondent, instead of moving to quash it for irregularity, appeared to the libel, filed his demurrer, and was content to let the regularity of the attachment abide the decision of the court upon the general questions raised upon the libel. The court appears to have treated the subject under the same views, since the decree of the District Court, after dismissing the libel, contains an order "that the goods, chattels and credits attached, be restored, with costs;" which decree was affirmed, pro forma, in the Circuit Court.

Upon this state of the case the cause has been argued, as one bringing up to this court a question on the regularity of the process issued by the clerk; and if the process so issued, and the return of the marshal upon it, and a motion to quash the writ, had been set out on the record, there is no question that the appeal would have brought up the whole subject. But as the record is deficient in these particulars, we do not perceive how we can take notice of that part of the judge's decision which orders the restoration of the goods attached.

We must therefore confine ourselves to the questions raised on the libel and demurrer.

The immediate question presented is, whether the court below erred in refusing to the libellant the process of attachment on the case made out in his libel.

486*] *And this resolves itself into two questions; the first arising on the right, the second on the remedy of the case. It must be here noticed that the legality of the seizure made by Almeida is not now in question; that question may be undergoing adjudication, for aught we know, in a court of competent jurisdiction, and we are not to be understood as prejudging the influence which the decision of a foreign tribunal may have upon the final adjudication between these parties. The defendant has demurred under protest, and the only question now is, whether the libelant has made out, prima facie, a good cause for relief in the admiralty.

The ground of complaint is a maritime tort, the violent seizure on the ocean of a sum of money, the property of the libelants. That the libelant would have been entitled to admiralty process against the property, had it been brought within the reach of our process, no one has questioned. The only doubt on this part of the subject is, whether the remedy in personam, for which this is a substitute (or, more properly, the form of instituting it), can be pursued in the admiralty.

On this point we consider it now too late to express a doubt. This court has entertained such suits too often, without hesitation, to permit the right now to be questioned. Such was the case of Maley v. Shattack, 3 Cranch, 458. Such is the principle recognized in Murray v. The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch, 483, where the court decrees damages against the libelant. *Such, also, was the principle in the [*487 case of The Apollon, 9 Wheat. Rep. 362, in which the libel was directly in personam, and damages decreed. We consider that question, therefore as not to be stirred.

The remedy by attachment, also, to compel appearance, has very respectable support in precedent. In the District Court of South Carolina, during the administration of a very able admiralty judge, it was resorted to habitually, both in cases of tort and contract. Bee's Adm. Rep. 141. The case of Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. Rep. 333, is the only one we know of, in which any view of this question appears to have been presented to this court. And there, undoubtedly, the exception taken was not to the issuing of the attachment in the abstract, but to the issuing of it against a prize made from a friendly power, before the property had been devested by condemnation. The response of the court on this point would seem to imply something more, since their decision is reported to have been, "that whatever might originally have been the irregularity in attaching the Industry and cargo, it is completely obviated, since the captors had a power to sell the prize, and by their own agreement they have consented that the proceeds of the sale should abide the present suit."

Still, there is nothing to be deduced from this case which can affect the question now under consideration. The point, as stated to have been presented to the court in argument, was certainly one of which a captor could not avail himself, *and the original owner [*488 of the prize was not in court. And although the court would appear to have had the present question in view when disposing of that point, yet it is only noticed arguendo, as they pass on to take a ground which precluded the necessity of considering the point made in argument.

We therefore consider this altogether a new question before this court.

The jurisdiction of the admiralty rests upon the grant in the constitution, and the terms in which that grant is extended to the respective courts of the United States. The forms and modes of proceeding in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction are prescribed to the courts by the second section of the process act of 1792. In the process act of 1789, the language made use of in prescribing those forms implied a general reference to the practice of the civil law; but in the act of 1792, the terms employed are, "according to the principles, rules and usages, which belong to courts of admiralty, as contradistinguished from courts of common law."

By the laws of Maryland, the right of attachment may be asserted in the courts of common law, and the court below appears to have considered the libel in this instance as an attempt by the libelant to avail himself in the admiralty of the common law remedy by attachment. The forms of the libel must determine this question, and there we find the prayer expressed in these words: "To the end, there- [*489 fore, that your libelants *may obtain speedy relief in the premises, they pray process of attachment against the said goods, and chattels, and credits, of the said J. A., which may be found within the jurisdiction of this honorable court, and the process thereof, according to the just course of the admiralty, and that monition viis et modis, be made accordingly," etc., "to compel an answer," etc.; and "finally, that the said goods, and chattels, and credits, when duly attached, may, by a decree of this honorable court, be condemned to answer the premises."

There can be little doubt, as well from the objects embraced in this prayer as from the argument, that the identity of the remedy in the common law and admiralty courts, appears to have been in the mind of the party libelant. Yet this was no ground for the total refusal of the relief prayed for; the writ should have been granted, and the question as to ulterior proceedings under it retained, to be disposed of afterwards. The prayer of the libel contemplates two purposes: first, to compel appearance; second, to condemn for satisfaction. Now, although the latter may be only incidental, and not the primary object of the attachment, yet, if it be legal for the purpose of compelling appearance, the demand for the one purpose was no ground for refusing it for the other.

In giving a construction to the act of 1792, it is unavoidable that we should consider the admiralty practice there alluded to as the admiralty practice of our own country, as grafted [*490 upon the *British practice; it is known to have had some peculiarities which have been incorporated into the jurisprudence of the United States. We had then been sixteen years an independent people, and had administered the admiralty jurisdiction, as well in admiralty courts of the states as in those of the general government; and if, in fact, a change had taken place in the practice of the two countries, that of our own certainly must claim precedence.

On the subject particularly under consideration, it appears from an English writer that the practice of issuing attachments had been discontinued in the English courts of admiralty, while in some of our own courts it was still in use, perhaps not so generally as to sanction our sustaining it altogether on authority, were we not of opinion that it has the highest sanction also, as well in principle as convenience.

It is a mistake to consider the use of this process in the admiralty as borrowed from, or in imitation of, the foreign attachment under the custom of London. Its origin is to be found in the remotest history, as well of the civil as the common law.

In the simplicity of the remote ages of the civil law, the plaintiff himself arrested the defendant, and brought him before the pretor. But as the sanctuary of his own habitation was not to be violated, if he came not abroad, a summons was attached to his door-posts citing him to appear and answer. Hence our monition viis et modis. If he still proved recusant after three *times repeating this solemn [*491 notice, a decree issued to attach his goods; and thus this process of the admiralty had a common origin with the common law mode of instituting a suit by summons and distress infinite. If the defendant obeyed, he could only appear upon giving bail; and thus, again, the analogy was kept up with the appearance at common law, which was synonymous with filing special bail.

Thus, this process has the clearest sanction in the practice of the civil law, and during the three years that the admiralty courts of these states were referred to the practice of the civil law for their "forms and modes of proceeding," there could have been no question that this process was legalized. Nor is there any thing in the different phraseology adopted in the act of 1892 that could preclude its use. That it is agreeable to the "principles, rules and usages, which belong to courts of admiralty," is established, not only by its being resorted to in one at least of the courts of the United States, but by the explicit declaration of a book of respectable authority, and remote origin, in which it is laid down thus: "If the defendant has concealed himself, or has absconded from the kingdom, so that he cannot be arrested, if he have any goods, merchandise, ship or vessel, on the sea, or within the ebb or flow of the sea, and within the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral, a warrant is to be impetrated to this effect, viz., to attach such goods or ship of D, the defendant, in whose hands soever they may be, and to cite the said *D specially as the owner, and all oth- [*492 ers who claim any right or title to them, to be and appear on a certain day to answer unto P in a civil and maritime cause." Clerke's Praxis by Hall, part 2, tit. 28.

I have cited the passage at length, in order to facilitate a reference which must be made to it on several other points in this opinion. And, (1) it appears from this authority that where a defendant has concealed himself, or absconded from the kingdom, this process may issue. In this particular, the averments in the libel conform literally to the authority.

2. It is required that the goods and effects to be attached should be within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. To this the libel conforms also, for the prayer is for process against "the said goods, and chattels, and credits of the said J. A., which may be found within the jurisdiction of the court, and the process thereof, according to the just course of the admiralty."

3. It is required that the attachment issue against any goods, merchandise, ship or vessel on the sea, etc. The only deviation in this particular is, that the process prayed for is against the credits, as well as the goods and chattels, etc., within the jurisdiction of the court.

On this part of the prayer, the question is raised as to what goods and chattels the attachment may issue, where situated, and whether against credits and effects in the hands of third persons, but not tangible or accessible to the marshal.

493*] *This question arises from a comparison of the tit. 32, p. 70, Clerke's Praxis by Hall, with the 28th before cited. The language of the 28th would seem to confine the operation of the attachment to goods and chattels "on the sea, or within the ebb and flow of the sea." But, by reference to the 32d, it appears that it is consistent with the practice of the admiralty also, in cases where there is no property which the officer can attach by manucaption, to proceed to attach goods or credits in the hands of third persons, by means of the simple service of a notice.

To all the questions which may be supposed to arise on this part of the case, we give one general answer, viz., that as goods and credits in the hands of a third person, wherever situated, may be attached by notice, there cannot be a reason assigned why the goods themselves, if accessible, should not be actually attached; and although it is very clear that the process of attaching by notice seems given as the alternative, where the officer cannot have access to the goods themselves, yet all this may be confided to the discretion of the judge who orders the process; and if the party libelant was entitled to the process at all, the court was not justified in refusing it altogether.

4. The libel prays that the articles attached may be condemned to answer the demand of the libelant.

On this subject it is very clear that the primary object of the attachment is to obtain an 494*] appearance. *But it is equally clear that upon the third default in personal actions, the goods arrested were estreated, and, after a year, finally abandoned to the plaintiff. But as this proceeding was too dilatory for the movements of the admiralty, the condemnation and sale, after proof of the cause of action, was substituted for it. There was, therefore, nothing incorrect in uniting the prayer for condemnation with the acknowledged end of forcing an appearance; and if there had been, it was no ground for refusing relief as far as the claim was sustainable in the admiralty.

It may be remarked here, that the case is somewhat embarrassed by the state of the pleadings, inasmuch as, after appearance, it is hardly conceivable on what ground the attachment could be granted. It would seem that the defendant, for some cause, had been permitted by the court to appear and plead without giving bail to the action. There are such causes known to the practice of the civil law, and we are compelled to take the case as we find it.

It has been further argued, that as the libel alleges the trespass complained of to have been piratically done, the civil remedy merges in the crime. But this, we think, clearly, cannot be maintained. Whatever may have been the barbarous doctrines of antiquity about converting goods piratically taken into droits of the admiralty, the day has long gone by since it gave way to a more rational rule, and the party dispossessed was sustained in his remedy to reclaim the *property as not devested [*495 by piratical capture. It is hardly necessary to quote authority for this doctrine, but it will be found to have been the rule of justice as early as the reports of Croke and Ventris.

If the party may recover his property, why not recover the value of it from any goods of the offender within reach of the admiralty? We think the doctrine of merger altogether inapplicable to the case. Even at common law, it was confined to felonies, and piracy was no felony at common law.

On the question, whether the property to be attached should have been specified in the libel or process, we have before remarked, that as neither the process nor return is before us, we can express no opinion respecting its form. The libel contains no specification of the articles to be attached, and if this were fatal, the demurrer might have been sustained. But, pursuing the analogy with the civil law process to compel appearance, we can see no reason for requiring such a specification. There is no reason to conclude that the decree for attachment issued against the recusant at the civil law, was otherwise than general. And although the other course may be pursued, and might be most convenient and satisfactory, yet we know of no imperative rule upon the subject. The authority on which the libel was filed sanctions the general language in which it is couched.

The last point made in argument was, whether the process of attachment could issue without an *order of the judge. But here, [*496 again, we have to remark that we can take no notice of the circumstances under which the writ actually did issue. And, looking to the libel, it appears to have been its express object to obtain such an order from the court. That the process of attachment at the civil law did not issue of course, is very well known. It was obtained for contumacy after monition; and analogy, as well as public convenience, would seem to render the judge's order necessary. Yet, we see no objection to pursuing the prayer of the libel, and issuing it simultaneously with the monition; the purposes of justice would seem to require that course.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that for a maritime trespass, even though it savors of piracy, the person injured may have his action in personam, and compel appearance by the process of attachment on the goods of the trespasser, according to the forms of the civil law, as ingrafted upon the admiralty practice. And we think it indispensable to the purposes of justice, and the due exercise of the admiralty jurisdiction, that the remedy should be applied, even in cases where the same goods may have been attachable under the process of foreign attachment issuing from the common law courts. For it will necessarily follow, in all such cases, that a question peculiarly of admiralty cognizance, will be brought to be examined before a tribunal not competent to exercise original admiralty jurisdiction; and that as a primary, not an incidental question; since the whole proceeding will have *for its [*497 object to determine whether a maritime trespass has been committed, and then to apply the remedy.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

THE GRAN PARA.

The Consul-General of Portugal, Libelant.

Where the Court of Admiralty has parted with the possession of the property, upon bail or stipulation, and it is necessary, for the purposes of justice, to retake the property into the custody of the court, the proper process against any person not a party to the stipulation, but who is alleged to have the actual or constructive possession, is a monition, and not an execution, in the first instance.

THIS is the same case which was reported ante, Vol. VII., p. 471, and was an appeal from proceedings had in the court below, under the mandate of this court in the original cause.

The cause was argued by Mr. D. Hoffman for the appellant, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Taney for the respondent. But as the present determination of the court was confined to the single point of practice, without affecting the other questions involved in the cause, it 498*] has *not been thought necessary to report the arguments of counsel.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court for the district of Maryland, from proceedings had in that court under the mandate of this court in the original cause, which is reported in 7 Wheat. Rep. 471.

The material facts are these: The original libel was against sundry quantities of gold and silver coin, and bullion, deposited by Daniels in the Marine Bank of Baltimore. A claim was interposed by one Nicholas Stansbury, asserting himself to be "agent, and attorney in fact," of Daniels, on behalf of the latter, and claiming restitution of the property as lawfully captured in war by Daniels. Pending the proceedings in the court below, Stansbury made application for the delivery of the property upon stipulation, and thereupon the court ordered that J. D. Daniels be permitted to draw for, and the president and directors of the Marine Bank be suffered to pay to Daniels, the money in controversy, provided that Daniels should enter into a stipulation in $23,000, with such surety or sureties as might be approved of by the libelant's proctors, to abide such further order or decree, either interlocutory or final, as might be made by the court in the premises. The libelant's proctors approved of Stansbury, and one Thomas Sheppard, and one Henry 499*] Didier, Jun., as sureties, *and they, accordingly, gave a stipulation for the amount "for J. D. Daniels, claimant." But Daniels himself was not a party to the stipulation. By a subsequent order of the court, the money was delivered by the Marine Bank to Stansbury, who signed a receipt for the same as attorney for Daniels, upon a certificate of the deposit originally given by the cashier of the bank to Daniels, and by him delivered over to Stansbury.

A decree of restitution having passed in the Supreme Court, after the mandate was brought into the Circuit Court, the libelant prayed that execution might issue against Daniels to enforce the performance of the decree, and that a monition, or other proper process, might issue against the sureties to the stipulation. To this course the proctor for the claimant objected, and the court finally ordered admiralty process to issue against the stipulators, but refused to make any further order under the motion of the libelant. The case is now before us by appeal from that decision.

Several points have been urged in the argument, upon which, in the present stage of the cause, it is not thought necessary to express any opinion. Assuming Daniels to be a party to the cause, in virtue of the claim made in his behalf by Stansbury, it still remains to show that the process of execution is, in the first instance, to be issued against him. He is not a party to the stipulation, and so far as any remedy is to be sought upon that, it lies exclusively against the *sureties, since he, [*500 as principal, has not, personally, or through the instrumentality, of any agent, become bound by it. The remedy against him for the property, or its proceeds, must be sought solely upon the ground that he has the actual or constructive possession of them in virtue of the delivery to his agent under the order of the court below. If the property had remained in the custody of the court, there is no pretense to say that he would be liable for the restitution. It is the delivery to him, or to his authorized agent, which can alone give rise to any liability on his part, whether he be a party to the suit, or only a custodee of the property or its proceeds. In such cases, the usual proceeding in the admiralty is, not to award execution against the party, for that would preclude him from showing, in his defense, that he never had any actual or constructive possession, or that he was discharged from all liability. The proper course is, to issue a monition to Daniels in the usual manner, upon the return of which he may appear and justify himself, and interpose such allegations on the merits as may bring all the matters fully before the court for judgment. This is the constant practice of the admiralty; and the subsequent proceedings are to be according to the common usage; upon which it is unnecessary to comment.

It is therefore the opinion of this court that the Circuit Court was right in refusing to grant an execution against Daniels, under the circumstances, and that its decretal order ought to be *affirmed; but inasmuch as it appears [*501 that the principal question between the parties has been, whether any process whatsoever could be awarded against Daniels, it is directed that the affirmation of the order be without prejudice to the award of a monition against Daniels in the common form of the admiralty.

Decree.—This cause came on, etc. On consideration whereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court, refusing to issue an execution against John D. Daniels, as prayed for by the libelant in his petition, be, and the same hereby is, affirmed with costs, without prejudice to the libelant, to apply to the said Circuit Court for a monition against the said John D. Daniels, in the premises, according to the usage of the admiralty, that being a process to which the libelant is entitled by law.

THE PALMYRA. Depau, Claimant.

No appeal lies from a decree of restitution, with costs and damages, in the Circuit Court; the report of the commissioners appointed to ascertain the damages not having been acted on by the court when the appeal was taken. Such a decree is not a final decree.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of South Carolina.

This was the case of an armed vessel called the Palmyra, taken under Spanish colors by the United States schooner Grampus (commanded by Lieutenant Gregory, and cruising, with instructions from the President, against pirates), and brought into the port of Charleston, S. C., for adjudication. A libel was filed by the captors, and a claim interposed by Mr. Depau, as agent of the alleged owners of the Palmyra, Spanish merchants domiciled at Porto Rico, and of the captain, officers and crew. In the District Court the libel was dismissed, without costs and damages against the captors. The decree of restitution was affirmed in the Circuit Court, with costs and damages, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

It was suggested by the Attorney-General (with whom was Mr. Hayne) for the appellants, that after the decree of restitution, and for damages, in the Circuit Court, there had been 503*] a *reference to commissioners to ascertain the amount of damages, and before the report of the commissioners had been acted upon by that court, the appeal was taken. The question was, whether the appeal was not taken too early, the judiciary act of March 3, 1803, c. 353 (XCIII.), having confined the right of appeal to "final decrees."[1]

Mr. Tazewell, contra, stated that in the District Court there was a decree of restitution and a denial of damages. Both parties appealed from that decree, the libelants being dissatisfied with the decree of restitution, and the claimants with the denial of damages. These were, then, cross-appeals, and consequently there might be an appeal from the decision of the Circuit Court decreeing restitution, and affirming, in this respect, the decree of the District Court, although the decree of the Circuit Court, reversing that of the District Court as to damages, and awarding the latter to the claimants, was as yet undetermined.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

The court has had the question submitted in this cause under consideration, and is of opinion that the appeal is not well taken. The decree of the Circuit Court was not final in the sense of the act of Congress. The damages remain undisposed of, and an appeal may still lie *upon that part of the decree award- [*504
ing damages. The whole cause is not, therefore, finally determined in the Circuit Court; and we are of opinion that the cause cannot be divided so as to bring up successively distinct parts of it.

The case in 3 Cranch, 179, is essentially different. In that case, which was an appeal in an equity cause, there was a decree of foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property. The sale could only be ordered after an account taken, or the sum due on the mortgage ascertained in some other way; and the usual decree is, that unless the defendant shall pay that sum in a given time, the estate shall be sold. The decree of sale therefore is, in such a case, final upon the rights of the parties in controversy, and leaves ministerial duties only to be performed.

Appeal dismissed.[2]

[*NOTE I.]

Documents Relating to the Slave Trade, Referred to in the Case of the Antelope.

(A.)

Report of the Committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message, of the 7th of December last, as relates to the Suppression of the Slave Trade.

FEBRUARY 16, 1825.—Read, and committed to the committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The committee on the suppression of the slave trade, to whom was referred so much of the President's message, of the 7th December last, as relates to that subject, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That, pursuant to the almost unanimous request of the House of Representatives, expressed by their resolution of the 28th of February, 1823, the President of the United States concluded a convention with Great Britain, on the 13th of March, in the following year, by which the African slave trade was denounced to be piracy under the laws of both countries; the United States having so declared it, by their antecedent act of the 15th of May, 1820, 4*] and it being understood between *the contracting parties, as a preliminary to the ratification of the convention of the United States, that Great Britain should, by an act of her parliament, concur in a similar declaration.

With great promptitude, and in accordance with this agreement, such an act was passed, declaring the African slave trade to be piracy, and annexing to it the penalty denounced against this crime by the common law of nations. A copy of this act was transmitted, by the British government, to the executive of the United States, and the convention submitted, by the President, to the Senate, for their advice and consent.

The convention was approved by the Senate, with certain qualifications, to all of which, except one, Great Britain, sub modo, acceded; her government having instructed its minister in Washington to tender to the acceptance of the United States, a treaty, agreeing in every particular except one with the terms approved by the Senate. This exception the message of the President to the House of Representatives presumes "not to be of sufficient magnitude to defeat an object so near to the heart of both nations," as the abolition of the African slave trade, "and so desirable to the friends of humanity throughout the world." But the President further adds, "that, as objections to the principle recommended by the House of Representatives, or, at least, to the consequences inseparable from it, and which are understood to apply to the law, have been raised, which may deserve a reconsideration of the whole subject, he has thought proper to suspend the conclusion of a new convention, until the definite sentiments of Congress can be ascertained."

Your committee are therefore required to review the grounds of the law of 1820, and the resolution of 1823, to which the rejected, or, as they rather hope, the suspended convention, referred. The former was the joint act of both branches of Congress, approved by the President; the latter, although adopted with extraordinary unanimity, was the single act of the House of Representatives.

Upon the principle or intention of the act of Congress of 1820, making the slave trade punishable as piracy, the history of the act may reflect some light.

A bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force the act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy, and also to make further provision to punish the crime of piracy," came to the House of Representatives on the 27th of April, 1820, and was, on the same day, referred to a committee of the whole, to which had been referred a bill of similar purport and title, that had originated in the House of Representatives.

*Upon the 8th of May following, the [*5 committee on the suppression of the slave trade reported an amendment of two additional sections to the Senate's bill; also, a bill to incorporate the American society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, and three joint resolutions, two of which related to the objects of that society; but the first of which, in behalf of both houses of Congress, requested the President "to consult and negotiate with all the governments where ministers of the United States are, or shall be, accredited, on the means of effecting an entire and immediate abolition of the African slave trade." The amendatory sections denounced the guilt and penalty of piracy against any citizen of the United States, of the crew or company of any foreign vessel, and any person whatever of the crew or company of any American vessel, who should be engaged in this traffic.

The amendments, bill and resolutions, along with the explanatory report which accompanied them, were referred to the committee of the whole above mentioned; and on the 11th of the same month, the house proceeded to consider them. After a discussion in the committee, the piracy bill and its amendments, having been adopted, were reported, and both were concurred in by the house. The following day, the bill as amended, being then on its passage, a motion was debated and negatived, to recommit the bill to a select committee, with an instruction to strike out the last section of the amendment. The bill then passed, and was ordered to be returned, as amended, to the Senate.

On the same day, a motion prevailed to discharge the committee of the whole from the further consideration of the bill, and the resolutions which accompanied the report; and the particular resolution already recited, being under consideration to try the sense of the House on its merits, it was moved to lay it on the table. The yeas and nays having been ordered on this motion, it was rejected by a majority of 78 to 35 members. It having been again proposed to postpone the resolution till the ensuing or second session of the same Congress, and this proposal being also determined in the negative, the resolution was engrossed, read the third time, passed, and ordered to be transmitted to the Senate on the same day with the piracy bill.

The amendments of this bill underwent like scrutiny and debate in the Senate, and were finally concurred in, the day after they were received from the House of Representatives, without any division apparent on the journal of that House.

The resolution which had been received by the Senate, at a different hour of the same day, was read a second time on the 15th of May, 6*] was *further taken up and considered, as in committee of the whole, reported to the House without amendment, and ordered, after debate, to pass to a third reading. But this being the last day of the session of Congress, and a single member objecting "that it was against one of the rules of the Senate to read it the third time on the same day without unanimous consent," it remained on the table of that body, on its final adjournment, after an ineffectual effort to suspend one of their rules, against which many of the friends of the resolution felt themselves compelled, by their invariable usage, to vote in union with its enemies.

One of the objections to the resolution in the Senate was founded upon the peculiar relation of that branch of the national legislature to the executive, in the ratification of treaties; which seemed, in the opinion of those who urged this argument, to interdict their concurrence in a request of the President to institute any negotiation whatever.

A cotemporary exposition of the object of the amendments of the piracy bill, and the resolution which the House of Representatives adopted by so large a majority, will be found in the report which accompanied them, from the committee on the suppression of the slave trade, and which is hereto annexed. (A) Those objects, it will be seen, were in perfect accordance with each other. They were designed to introduce, by treaty, into the code of international law, a principle deemed by the committee essential to the abolition of the African slave trade that it should be denounced and treated as piracy by the civilized world.

The resolution being joint, and having failed in the Senate, for the reason already stated, the subject of it was revived in the House of Representatives, at a very early period of the succeeding session of Congress, by a call for information from the executive, which, being received, was referred to a committee of the same title with the last. Their report, after reviewing all the antecedent measures of the United States for the suppression of the slave trade, urgently recommended the co-operation of the American and British navy against this traffic, under the guarded provisions of a common treaty, authorizing the practice of a qualified and reciprocal right of search.

This report, which is also annexed, closed with a resolution requesting "the President of the United States to enter into such arrangements as he might deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade." (B.)

The United States had, by the treaty of Ghent, entered into a formal stipulation with Great Britain, "that both the contracting parties *shall use their best endeavors to [*7 accomplish the entire abolition of this traffic."

The failure of the only joint attempt which had been made by England and America, at the date of this report, to give effect to this provision; being ascribable, in part, to a jealousy of the views of the former, corroborated by the language and conduct of one of the principal maritime powers of Europe in relation to the same topic, the committee referred to the decision of Sir William Scott, in the case of the French ship Le Louis, to demonstrate that Great Britain claimed no right of search, in peace, but such as the consent of other nations should accord to her by treaty; and sought it by a fair exchange, in this tranquil mode, for the beneficient purpose of an enlarged humanity.

Certain facts, disclosed by the diplomatic correspondence of France and England during the pendency of that case in the British Court of Admiralty, were calculated to guard the sympathies of America from being misguided by the language of the former power.

The painful truth was elicited that France had evaded the execution of her promise at Vienna, to Europe and mankind. That she had, long after the date of that promise, tolerated, if she had not cherished, several branches of a traffic which she had concurred in denouncing to be the opprobrium of Christendom, and which she had subsequently bound herself, by the higher obligations of a solemn treaty, to abolish, as inconsistent with the laws of God and nature.

Succeeding events in the councils of the French nation have not impaired the force of this testimony. What authority can be accorded to the moral influence of a government which insults the humanity of a generous and gallant people, by pleading, in apology for the breach of its plighted faith, that its subjects required the indulgence of this guilty traffic?

The Emperor Napoleon, who re-established this commerce on the ruins of the French Republic, also abolished it again when he sought to conciliate the people of France, during that transient reign, which immediately preceded his final overthrow.

Congress adjourned without acting on this report.

By an instruction to the committee on the suppression of the slave trade, of the 15th of January, 1822, the same subject was a third time brought directly before the House of Representatives. The instruction called the attention of the committee to the present condition of the African slave trade; to the defects of any of the existing laws for its suppression, and to their appropriate remedies. In the re-8*] port, made in obedience *to this instruction, on the 12th of April, 1822, the committee state that after having consulted all the evidence within their reach, they are brought to the mournful conclusion that the traffic prevailed to a greater extent than ever, and with increased malignity; that its total suppression, or even sensible diminution, cannot be expected from the separate and disunited efforts of one or more states, so long as a single flag remains to cover it from detection and punishment. They renew, therefore, as the only practicable and efficient remedy, the concurrence of the United States with the maritime powers of Europe, in a modified and reciprocal exercise of the right of search.

In closing their report, the committee add, in effect, that they "cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted and peaceful concession, by treaty, suggested by the committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity." The committee had before intimated that the remedy which they recommended to the House of Representatives presupposed the exercise of the authority of another department of the government; and that objections to the exercise of this authority, in the mode which they had presumed to suggest, had hitherto existed in that department. Their report, also annexed, closed with a resolution differing in no other respect from that of the preceding session, than that it did not require the concurrence of the Senate, for the reason already suggested. (C.)

The report and resolution were referred to a committee of the whole, and never farther considered.

After a delay till the 20th of the succeeding February, a resolution was submitted to the House, which was evidently a part of the same system of measures, for the suppression of the slave trade, which had been begun by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, and followed up by the connected series of reports and resolutions, which the committee have reviewed, and which breathe the same spirit.

This resolution, in proposing to make the slave trade piracy, by the consent of mankind, sought to supplant, by a measure of greater rigor, the qualified international exchange of the right of search for the apprehension of the African slave dealer, and the British system of mixed tribunals, created for his trial and punishment; a system of which experience, and the recent extension of the traffic that it sought to limit, had disclosed the entire inefficacy.

The United States had already established the true denomination and *grade of this [*9 offense, by a municipal law. The resolution contemplated, as did the report which accompanied and expounded that law, the extension of its principle, by negotiation, to the code of all nations.

It denounced the authors of this stupendous iniquity as the enemies of the human race, and armed all men with authority to detect, pursue, arrest and punish them.

Such a measure, to succeed to its fullest extent, must have a beginning somewhere. Commencing with the consent of any two states, to regard it as binding on themselves only, it would, by the gradual accession of others, enlarge the sphere of its operation, until it embraced, as the resolution contemplated, all the maritime powers of the civilized world.

While it involved of necessity the visit and search of piratical vessels, as belligerent rights against the common enemies of man, it avoided all complexity, difficulty and delay in the seizure, condemnation and punishment of the pirate himself. It made no distinction in favor of those pirates who prey upon the property, against those who seize, torture and kill, or consign to interminable and hereditary slavery, the persons of their enemies.

Your committee are at a loss for the foundation of any such discrimination. It is believed that the most ancient piracies consisted in converting innocent captives into slaves; and those were not attended with the destruction of one-third of their victims, by loathsome confinement and mortal disease.

While the modern, therefore, accords with the ancient denomination of this crime, its punishment is not disproportionate to its guilt. It has robbery and murder for its mere accessories, and moistens one continent with blood and tears, in order to curse another by slow consuming ruin, physical and moral.

One high consolation attends upon the new remedy for this frightful and prolific evil. If once successful, it will forever remain so, until, being unexerted, its very application will be found in history alone.

Can it be doubted that if ever legitimate commerce shall supplant the source of this evil in Africa, and a reliance on other supplies of labor, its use elsewhere, a revival of the slave trade will be as impracticable as a reversion to barbarism? That, after the lapse of a century from its extinction, except where the consequences of the crime shall survive, the stories of the African slave trade will become as improbable among the unlearned, as the expeditions of the heroes of Homer?

The principle of the law of 1820, making the slave trade a statutory piracy, and of the resolution of the House of Representatives, of May, *1823, which sought to render this de- [*10 nunciation of that offense universal, cannot, therefore, be misunderstood.

It was not misconceived by the House of Representatives, when ratified with almost unprecedented unanimity.

An unfounded suggestion has been heard, that the abortive attempt to amend the resolution, indicated that it was not considered as involving the right of search. The opposite conclusion is the more rational, if not, indeed, irresistible; that having, by the denomination of the crime, provided for the detection, trial and punishment of the criminal, an amendment, designing to add what was already included in the main proposition, would be superfluous, if not absurd. But no such amendment was rejected. The House of Representatives, very near the close of the session of 1823, desirous of economizing time, threatened to be consumed by a protracted debate, entertained the previous question, while an amendment, the only one offered to the resolution, was depending. The effect of the previous question was to bring on an immediate decision upon the resolution itself, which was adopted by a vote of 131 members to 9.

It is alike untrue that the resolution was regarded with indifference. The House had been prepared to pass it without debate, by a series of measures, having their origin in 1819, and steadily advancing to maturity.

Before the resolution did pass, two motions had been submitted, to lay it on the table, and to postpone it to a future day. The former was resisted by an ascertained majority of 104 to 25; the latter, without a division.

Is the House now ready to retrace its steps? The committee believe not. Neither the people of America, nor their representatives, will sully the glory they have earned by their early labor, and steady perseverance, in sustaining, by their federal and state governments, the cause of humanity at home and abroad.

The calamity inflicted upon them by the introduction of slavery, in a form, and to an extent forbidding its hasty alleviation by intemperate zeal, is imputable to a foreign cause, for which the past is responsible to the present age. They will not deny to themselves, and to mankind, a generous co-operation in the only efficient measure of retributive justice, to an insulted and afflicted continent, and to an injured and degraded race.

In the independence of Spanish and Portuguese America, the committee *behold [*11 a speedy termination of the few remaining obstacles to the extension of the policy of the resolution of May, 1823.

Brazil cannot intend to resist the voice of the residue of the continent of America; and Portugal, deprived of her great market for slaves, will no longer have a motive to resist the common feelings of Europe. And yet, while from the Rio de la Plata to the Amazon, and through the American Archipelago, the importation of slaves covertly continues, if it be not openly countenanced, the impolicy is obvious, of denying to the American shore the protective vigilance of the only adequate check upon this traffic.

Your committee forbear to enter upon an investigation of the particular provision of a depending negotiation, nor do they consider the message referred to them as inviting any such inquiry.

They will not regard a negotiation to be dissolved, which has approached so near consummation, nor a convention as absolutely void, which has been executed by one party, and which the United States, having first tendered, should be the last to reject.

Report of the Committee to whom was referred, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, so much of the President's Message as relates to the Slave Trade, accompanied with a bill to incorporate the American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States.

MAY 8, 1820.—Read twice, and, with the bill, committed to the committee of the whole House on the bill from the Senate, to continue in force an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy, etc. etc.

The committee on the slave trade, to whom was referred the memorial of the president and board of managers of the American society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, have, according to order, had under consideration the several subjects therein embraced, and report:

That the American society was instituted in the city of Washington, on the 28th of December, 1816, for the benevolent purpose of affording [*12] ing *to the free people of color of the United States the means of establishing one or more independent colonies on the western coast of Africa. After ascertaining, by a mission to that continent, and other preliminary inquiries, that their object is practicable, the society requests of the Congress of the United States a charter of incorporation, and such other legislative aid as their enterprise may be thought to merit and require.

The memorialists anticipate from its success consequences the most beneficial to the free people of color themselves, to the several states in which they at present reside, and to that continent which is to be the seat of their future establishment. Passing by the foundation of these anticipations, which will be seen in the annual reports of the society and their former memorials, the attention of the committee has been particularly drawn to the connection which the memorialists have traced between their purpose and the policy of the recent act of Congress, for the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

Experience has demonstrated that this detestable traffic can be nowhere so successfully assailed as on the coast upon which it originates. Not only does the collection and embarkation of its unnatural cargoes consume more time than their subsequent distribution and sale in the market for which they are destined, but the African coast, frequented by the slave ships, is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors, that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a few active cruisers. If to these be added colonies of civilized blacks, planted in commanding situations along that coast, no slave ship could possibly escape detection; and thus the security, as well as the enhanced profit which now cherishes this illicit trade, would be effectually counteracted. Such colonies, by diffusing a taste for legitimate commerce among the native tribes of that fruitful continent, would gradually destroy among them, also, the only incentive of a traffic which has hitherto rendered all African labor insecure, and spread desolation over one of the most beautiful regions of the globe. The colonies, and the armed vessels employed in watching the African coast, while they cooperated alike in the cause of humanity, would afford to each other mutual succor.

There is a single consideration, however, added to the preceding view of this subject, which appears to your committee, of itself, conclusive of the tendency of the views of the memorialists to further the operation of the act of the 3d of March, 1819. That act not only revokes the authority antecedently given 13*] to the several state and territorial *governments, to dispose, as they pleased, of those African captives who might be liberated by the tribunals of the United States, but authorizes and requires the President to restore them to their native country. The unavoidable consequence of this just and humane provision is, to require some preparation to be made for their temporary succor, on being relanded upon the African shore. And no preparation can prove so congenial to its own object, or so economical, as regards the government charged with this charitable duty, as that which would be found in a colony of the free people of color of the United States. Sustained by the recommendations of numerous societies in every part of the United States, and the approving voice of the legislative assemblies of several states, without inquiring into any other tendency of the object of the memorialists, your committee do not hesitate to pronounce it deserving of the countenance and support of the general government. The extent to which these shall be carried, is a question not so easily determined.

The memorialists do not ask the government to assume the jurisdiction of the territory, or to become, in any degree whatever, responsible for the future safety or tranquility of the contemplated colony. They have prudently thought that its external peace and security would be most effectually guarded, by an appeal in its behalf to the philanthropy of the civilized world, and to that sentiment of retributive justice, with which all Christendom is at present animated towards a much injured continent.

Of the constitutional power of the general government to grant the limited aid contemplated by the accompanying bill and resolutions, your committee presume there can exist no shadow of doubt; and they leave it to a period of greater national prosperity to determine how far the authority of Congress, the resources of the national government, and the welfare and happiness of the United States, will warrant or require its extension

Your committee are solemnly enjoined by the peculiar object of their trust, and invited by the suggestion of the memorialists, to inquire into the defects of the existing laws against the African slave trade. So long as it is in the power of the United States to provide additional restraints upon this odious traffic, they cannot be withheld, consistently with justice and the honor of the nation.

Congress have heretofore marked, with decided reprobation, the authors and abettors of this iniquitous commerce, in every form which it assumes; from the inception of its unrighteous purpose in America, *through all [*14 the subsequent stages of its progress, to its final consummation; the outward voyage; the cruel seizure and forcible abduction of the unfortunate African from his native home, and the fraudulent transfer of the property thus acquired. It may, however, be questioned, if a proper discrimination of their relative guilt has entered into the measure of punishment annexed to these criminal acts.

Your committee cannot perceive wherein the offense of kidnapping an unoffending inhabitant of a foreign country; of chaining him down for a series of days, weeks and months, amidst the dying and the dead, to the pestilential hold of a slave ship; of consigning him, if he chance to live out the voyage, to perpetual slavery in a remote and unknown land, differs in malignity from piracy, or why a milder punishment should follow the one than the other crime.

On the other hand, the purchase of the unfortunate African, after his enlargement from the floating dungeon which wafts him to the foreign market, however criminal in itself, and yet more in its tendency to encourage this abominable traffic, yields in atrocity to the violent seizure of his person, his sudden and unprepared separation from his family, his kindred, his friends and his country, followed by all the horrors of the middle passage. Are there not united in this offense all that is most iniquitous in theft, most daring in robbery, and cruel in murder? Its consequences to the victim, if he survives, to the country which receives him, and to that from which he is torn, are alike disastrous. If the internal wars of Africa, and their desolating effect, may be imputed to the slave trade—and that the greater part of them must now, cannot be questioned—this crime, considered in its remote as well as its proximate consequences, is the very darkest in the whole catalogue of human iniquities; and its authors should be regarded as hostes humani generis.

In proposing to the House of Representatives to make such part of this offense as occurs upon the ocean, piracy, your committee are animated, not by the desire of manifesting to the world the horror with which it is viewed by the American people, but by the confident expectation of promoting, by this example, its more certain punishment by all nations, and its absolute and final extinction.

May it not be believed, that when the whole civilized world shall have denounced the slave trade as piracy, it will become as unfrequent as any other species of that offense against the law of nations? Is it unreasonable to suppose that negotiations will, with greater facility, introduce into that law such a provision as is here proposed, when it shall have been already incorporated into the separate code of each state?

15*] *The maritime powers of the Christian world have, at length, concurred in pronouncing sentence of condemnation against this traffic. The United States, having led the way in forming this decree, owe it to themselves not to follow the rest of mankind in promoting its vigorous execution.

If it should be objected that the legislation of Congress would be partial, and its benefit, for a time a least, local, it may be replied that the constitutional power of the government has already been exercised in defining the crime of piracy, in accordance with similar analogies, to that which the committee have sought to trace between this general offense against the peace of nations and the slave trade.

In some of the foreign treaties, as well as in the laws of the United States, examples are to be found of piracies, which are not cognizable, as such, by the tribunals of all nations. Such is the unavoidable consequence of any exercise of the authority of Congress, to define and punish this crime. The definition and punishment can bind the United States alone.

A bill from the Senate, making further provision for the exercise of this constitutional power, being now before the House of Representatives, your committee beg leave to offer such an amendment of its provisions as shall attain the last object which they have presumed to recommend.

Report of the Committee to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the Slave Trade.

FEBRUARY 9, 1821.—Read, and ordered to lie upon the table

The committee, to which is referred so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade, and to which are referred the two messages of the President, transmitting, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th of December, a report of the Secretary of State, and enclosed documents relating to the negotiations for the suppression of the slave trade, report:

That the committee have deemed it advis-

16*] able, previous to entering *into a consideration of the proposed co-operation to exterminate the slave trade, to take a summary review of the constitution and laws of the United States relating to this subect. It will disclose the earnestness and zeal with which this nation has been actuated, and the laudable ambition that has animated her councils to take a lead in the reformation of a disgraceful practice, and one which is productive of so much human misery; it will, by displaying the constant anxiety of this nation to suppress the African slave trade, afford ample testimony that she will be the last to persevere in measures wisely digested, to effectuate this great and most desirable object, whenever such measures can be adopted in consistency with the leading principles of her local institutions.

In consequence of the existence of slavery in many of the states when British colonies, the habits and means of carrying on industry could not be suddenly changed; and the constitution of the United States yielded to the provision that the migration or importation of such persons, as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

But, long antecedent to this period, Congress legislated on the subject, wherever its power extended, and endeavored, by a system of rigorous penalties, to suppress this unnatural trade.

The act of Congress of the 22d of March, 1794, contains provisions that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person coming into, or residing within the same, shall, for himself, or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor or owner, build, fit, equip, load or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel, within any port or place of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring from any foreign kingdom, place or country, the inhabitants of such kingdom, place or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port or place whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, under the penalty of the forfeiture of any such vessel, and of the payment of large sums of money by the persons offending against the directions of the act.

By an act of the 3d of April, 1798, in relation to the Mississippi territory, to which the constitutional provision did not extend, the introduction of slaves, under severe penalties, was forbidden, and every slave imported contrary to the act was to be entitled to freedom.

By an act of the 10th of May, 1800, the citizens, or residents of this country, were prohibited from holding any right or property in vessels *employed in transporting slaves [*17 from one foreign country to another, on pain of forfeiting their right of property, and also double the value of that right in money, and double the value of their interest in the slaves; nor were they allowed to serve on board of vessels of the United States, employed in the transportation of slaves from one country to another, under the punishment of fine and imprisonment; nor were they permitted to serve on board foreign ships employed in the slave trade. By this act, also, the commissioned vessels of the United States were authorized to seize vessels and crews employed contrary to the act.

By an act of the 28th of February, 1803, masters of vessels were not allowed to bring into any port (where the laws of the state prohibited the importation) any negro, mulatto or other person of color not being a native, a citizen or registered seaman, of the United States, under severe penalties; and no vessel, having on board persons of the above description, was to be admitted to an entry; and if any such person should be landed from on board of any vessel, the same was to be forfeited.

By an act of the 2d of March, 1807, the importation of slaves into any port of the United States was to be prohibited after the first of January, 1808, the time prescribed by the constitutional provision. This act contains many severe provisions against any interference or participation in the slave trade, such as heavy fines, long imprisonments, and the forfeiture of vessels. The President was also authorized to employ armed vessels to cruise on any part of the coast where he might judge attempts would be made to violate the act, and to instruct the commanders of armed vessels to seize, and bring in, vessels found on the high seas, contravening the provisions of the law.

By an act of the 20th of April, 1818, the laws, in prohibition of the slave trade, were further improved; this act is characterized with a peculiarity of legislative precaution, especially in the eighth section, which throws the labor of proof upon the defendant, that the colored persons brought into the United States by him had not been brought in contrary to the laws.

By an act of the 3d of March, 1819, the power is continued in the President, to employ the armed ships of the United States to seize and bring into any port any vessel engaged in the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States; and such vessels, together with the goods and effects on board, are to be forfeited and sold, and the proceeds to be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy; and the officers and crew are to undergo 18*] *the punishments inflicted by previous acts. The President, by this act, is authorized to make such regulations and arrangements as he may deem expedient, for the safe keeping, support and removal, beyond the limits of the United States, of all such negroes, mulattoes or persons of color, as may have been brought within its jurisdiction, and to appoint a proper person or persons, residing on the coast of Africa, as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes or persons of color, delivered from on board of vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade.

And in addition to all the aforesaid laws, the present Congress, on the 15th of May, 1820, believing that the then existing provisions would not be sufficiently available, enacted, that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and on foreign shore seize, any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor, by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring, or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto, on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and on conviction shall suffer death.

The immoral and pernicious practice of the slave trade has attracted much public attention in Europe, within the last few years, and in a congress at Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1815, five of the principal powers made a solemn engagement, in the face of mankind, that this traffic should be made to cease; in pursuance of which, these powers have enacted municipal laws to suppress the trade. Spain, although not a party to the original engagement, did, soon after, in her treaty with England, stipulate for the immediate abolition of the Spanish slave trade, to the north of the equator, and for its final and universal abolition on the 30th of May, 1820.

Portugal, likewise, in her treaty in 1817, stipulated that the Portuguese slave trade on the coast of Africa should entirely cease to the northward of the equator, and engaged that it should be unlawful for her subjects to purchase or trade in slaves, except to the southward of the line; the precise period at which the entire abolition is to take place in Portugal does not appear to be finally fixed; but the Portuguese ambassador, in the presence of the congress at Vienna, declared that Portugal, faithful to *her principles, would not re- [*19 fuse to adopt the term of eight years, which term will expire in the year 1823.

At this time, among the European states, there is not a flag which can legally cover this inhuman traffic to the north of the line; nevertheless, experience has proved the inefficacy of the various and rigorous laws which have been made in Europe and in this country; it being a lamentable fact that the disgraceful practice is even now carried on to a surprising extent. During the last year, Captain Trenchard, the commander of the United States sloop of war the Cyane, found that part of the coast of Africa which he visited, lined with vessels, engaged, as it is presumed, in this forbidden traffic. Of these, he examined many; and five, which appeared to be fitted out on American account, he sent into the jurisdiction of the United States for adjudication. Each of them, it is believed, has been condemned, and the commanders of two of them have been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by the laws of the United States.

The testimony recently published, with the opinion of the presiding judge of the United States Court of the southern district in the state of New York, in the case of the schooner Plattsburg, lays open a scene of the grossest fraud that could be practiced to deceive the officers of government, and conceal the unlawful transaction.

The extension of the trade for the last 25 or 30 years must, in a degree, be conjectural; but the best information that can be obtained on the subject, furnishes good foundation to believe that, during that period, the number of slaves withdrawn from western Africa amounts to upwards of a million and a half; the annual average would be a mean somewhere between fifty and eighty thousand.

The trade appears to be lucrative in proportion to its heinousness; and, as it is generally inhibited, the unfeeling slave dealers, in order to elude the laws, increase its horrors; the innocent Africans, who are mercilessly forced from their native homes in irons, are crowded in vessels and situations which are not adapted for the transportation of human beings; and this cruelty is frequently succeeded, during the voyage to their destination, with dreadful mortality. Further information on this subject will appear in a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing two other letters, marked 1 and 2, and also by the extract of a letter from an officer of the Cyane, dated April 10, 1820, which are annexed to this report. While the slave trade exists, there can be no prospect of civilization in Africa.

However well disposed the European powers 20*] may be to effect a practical *abolition of the trade, it seems generally acknowledged that, for the attainment of this object, it is necessary to agree upon some concerted plan of cooperation; but, unhappily, no arrangement has as yet obtained universal consent.

England has recently engaged in treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, in which the mutual right of visitation and search is exchanged. This right is of a special and limited character, as well in relation to the number and description of vessels as to space; and to avoid possible inconveniences, no suspicious circumstances are to warrant the detention of a vessel; this right is restricted to the simple fact of slaves being on board.

These treaties contemplate the establishment of mixed courts, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two contracting nations, the one to reside in a possession belonging to His Britannic Majesty; the other within the territory of the other respective power. When a vessel is visited and detained, it is to be taken to the nearest court, and, if condemned, the vessel is to be declared a lawful prize, as well as the cargo, and are to be sold for the profit of the two nations; the slaves are to receive a certificate of emancipation, and to be delivered over to the government on whose territory the court is which passes sentence, to be employed as servants or free laborers; each of the governments binds itself to guaranty the liberty of such portion of these individuals as may be respectively assigned to it. Particular provisions are made for remuneration, in case vessels are not condemned after trial, and special instructions are stipulated to be furnished to commanders of vessels possessing the qualified right of visitation and search.

These powers entertain the opinion that nothing short of the concession of a qualified right of visitation and search can practically suppress the slave trade. An association of armed ships is contemplated, to form a species of naval police, to be stationed principally in the African seas, where the commanders of the ships will be enabled to co-operate in harmony and concert.

The United States have been earnestly invited, by the principal Secretary of State for foreign affairs of the British government, to join in the same, or similar arrangements; and this invitation has been sanctioned and enforced by a unanimous vote of the House of Lords and Commons, in a manner that precludes all doubts as to the sincerity and benevolence of their design.

In answer to this invitation, the President of the United States has expressed his regret that the stipulations in the treaties communicated, are *of a character to which the peculiar [*21 situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede.

The objections made are contained in an extract of a letter from the Secretary of State, under date of the 2d of November, 1818, in which it is observed that, 'in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all the essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States. The powers agreed to be reciprocally given to the officers of the ships of war of either party, to enter, search, capture and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution, by each treaty, of two mixed courts, one of which is to reside in the external or colonial possession of each of the two parties respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity, without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation, to search the merchant vessels of another, would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system, the United States, having no colonies either on the coast of Africa, or in the West Indies, cannot give effect. That, by the constitution of the United States, it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior; and that they shall be removable by impeachment, or conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There may be doubts, whether the power of the government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the territories of the United States—a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon statutes of the United States without appeal.

"That the disposal of the negroes found on board of the slave trading vessels, which might be condemned by the sentence of these mixed courts, cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for, if the slaves of vessels condemned by the mixed courts should be delivered over to the government of the United States as freemen, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being, in this Union, regulated by municipal laws of the separate states, the government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the states where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the states where they would *be recognized as free. [*22

That the admission of a right in the officers of foreign ships of war, to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country; and that there would be no prospect of a ratification, by advice and consent of the senate, to any stipulation of that nature. That the search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country, that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted, to a time of peace; and that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light, if, as in the treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships of war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships of war of another."

The committee will observe, in the first instance, that a mutual right of search appears to be indispensable to the great object of abolition; for, while flags remain as a cover for this traffic, against the right of search by any vessel except of the same nation, the chance of detection will be much less than it would be if the right of search was extended to vessels of other powers; and as soon as any one nation should cease to be vigilant in the discovery of infractions practiced on its own code, the slave dealers would avail themselves of a system of obtaining fraudulent papers, and concealing the real ownership under the cover of such flags, which would be carried on with such address as to render it easy for the citizens or subjects of one state to evade their own municipal laws; but if a concerted system existed, and a qualified right of mutual search was granted, the apprehension of these piratical offenders would be reduced to a much greater certainty; and the very knowledge of the existence of an active and vigorous system of co-operation would divert many from this practice, as the unlawful trade would become too hazardous for profitable speculation.

In relation to any inconveniences that might result from such an arrangement, the commerce of the United States is so limited on the African coast that it could not be much affected by it; and as it regards economy, the expense of stationing a few vessels on that coast would not be much greater than to maintain them at any other place.

The committee have briefly noticed the practical results of a reciprocal right of search, as it bears on the slave trade; but the objection as to the propriety of ceding this right remains. It is with deference that the committee undertake to make any remarks upon it. They bear in recollection the opinions entertained in this 23*] country on the practice of searching *neutral vessels in time of war; but they cannot perceive that the right under discussion is, in principle, allied, in any degree, to the general question of search; it can involve no commitment, nor is it susceptible of any unfavorable inference on that subject; and even if there were any affinity between the cases, the necessity of a special agreement would be inconsistent with the idea of existing rights; the proposal itself, in the manner made, is a total abandonment, on the part of England, of any claim to visit and search vessels in a time of peace, and this question has been unequivocally decided in the negative in her admiralty courts.

Although it is not among the objections that the desired arrangement would give any color to a claim or right of search in time of peace, yet, lest the case in this respect may be prejudiced in the minds of any, the committee will observe that the right of search, in time of peace, is one that is not claimed by any power as a part of the law of nations. No nation pretends that it can exercise the right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, except upon the belligerent claim. A recent decision in the British Admiralty Court, in the case of the French slave ship Le Louis, is clear and decisive on this point. The case is annexed to this report.

In regard, then, to the reciprocal right wished to be ceded it is reduced to the simple inquiry whether, in practice, it will be beneficial to the two contracting nations. Its exercise, so far as it relates to the detention of vessels, as it is confined to the fact of slaves being actually on board, precludes almost the possibility of accident or much inconvenience.

In relation also to the disposal of the vessels and slaves detained, an arrangement, perhaps, could be effected, so as to deliver them up to the vessels of the nation to which the detained vessel should belong. Under such an understanding, the vessels and slaves delivered to the jurisdiction of the United States might be disposed of in conformity with the provisions of our own act of the 3d of March, 1819; and an arrangement of this kind would be free from any of the other objections.

An exchange of the right of search, limited in duration, or to continue at pleasure, for the sake of experiment, might, it is anxiously hoped, be so restricted to vessels and seas, and with such civil and harmonious stipulations, as not to be unacceptable.

The feelings of this country on the general question of search, have often been roused to a degree of excitement that evince their unchangeable character; but the American people will readily see the distinction between the cases; the one, in its exercise to the extent claimed, will *ever produce irritation, [*24 and excite a patriotic spirit of resistance; the other is amicable and charitable; the justness and nobleness of the undertaking are worthy of the combined concern of Christian nations.

The detestable crime of kidnapping the unoffending inhabitants of one country, and chaining them to slavery in another, is marked with all the atrociousness of piracy; and, as such, it is stigmatized and punishable by our own laws.

To efface this reproachful stain from the character of civilized mankind, would be the proudest triumph that could be achieved in the cause of humanity. On this subject, the United States, having led the way, owe it to themselves to give their influence and cordial co-operation to any measure that will accomplish the great and good purpose. But this happy result, experience has demonstrated, cannot be realized by any system, except a concession by the maritime powers to each other's ships of war, of a qualified right of search. If this object was generally attained, it is confidently believed that the active exertions of even a few nations would be sufficient entirely to suppress the slave trade.

The slave dealers could be successfully assailed on the coast upon which the trade originates, as they must necessarily consume more time in the collection and embarkation of their cargoes than in the subsequent distribution in the markets for which they are destined; this renders that coast the most advantageous position for their apprehension; and, besides, the African coast, frequented by the slave ships, is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors, that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a small number of cruisers. But if the slave ships are permitted to escape from the African coast, and to be dispersed to different parts of the world, their capture would be rendered uncertain and hopeless.

The committee, after much reflection, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

25*] *Case of the French slave ship Le Louis, extracted from the 12th annual report of the African Institution, printed in 1818.

This vessel sailed from Martinique on the 30th of January, 1816, on a slave trading voyage to the coast of Africa, and was captured near Cape Mesurado, by the Sierra Leone colonial vessel of war, the Queen Charlotte, after a severe engagement which followed an attempt to escape, in which eight men were killed and twelve wounded of the British; and, proceedings having been instituted against Le Louis in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Sierra Leone, as belonging to French subjects, and as fitted out, manned and navigated for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade, after the trade had been abolished both by the internal laws of France, and by the treaty between that country and Great Britain, the ship and cargo were condemned as forfeited to His Majesty.

From this sentence an appeal having been made to the High Court of Admiralty, the cause came on for hearing, when the court reversed the judgment of the inferior court, and ordered the restitution of the property to the claimants.

The judgment of Sir William Scott was given at great length. The directors will advert to such points of it as are immediately connected with their present subject. "No doubt," he said, "could exist that this was a French ship, intentionally engaged in the slave trade." But, as these were facts which were ascertained in consequence of its seizure, before the seizor could avail himself of this discovery, it was necessary to inquire whether he possessed any right of visitation and search; because, if the discovery was unlawfully produced, he could not be allowed to take advantage of the consequences of his own wrong.

The learned judge then discussed, at considerable length, the question, whether the right of search exists in time of peace. And he decided it without hesitation in the negative. "I can find," he says, "no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of states in amity, upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals. No nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim." He admits, indeed, and with just concern, that if this right be not conceded in time of peace, it will be extremely difficult to suppress the traffic in slaves.

"The great object, therefore, ought to be, to obtain the concurrence of other nations, by application, by remonstrance, by example, by every peaceable instrument which men can employ to attract the consent of *men. But [*26 a nation is not justified in assuming rights that do not belong to her, merely because she means to apply them to a laudable purpose."

"If this right," he adds, "is imported into a state of peace, it must be done by convention; and it will then be for the prudence of states to regulate, by such convention, the exercise of right, with all the softenings of which it is susceptible."

The judgment of Sir Walter Scott would have been equally conclusive against the legality of this seizure, even if it could have been established in evidence that France had previously prohibited the slave trade by her municipal laws. For the sake of argument, however, he assumes that the view he has taken of the subject might, in such a case, be controverted. He proceeds, therefore, to inquire how far the French law had actually abolished the slave trade at the time of this adventure. The actual state of the matter, as collected from the documents before the court, he observes, is this:

"On the 27th of July, 1815, the British minister at Paris writes a note to Prince Talleyrand, then minister to the King of France, expressing a desire on the part of his court to be informed whether, under the law of France as it then stood, it was prohibited to French subjects to carry on the slave trade. The French minister informs him, in answer, on the 30th of July, that the law of the Usurper on that subject was null and void (as were all his decrees), but that His Most Christian Majesty had issued directions that, on the part of France, "the traffic should cease, from the present time, everywhere, and forever."

"In what form these directions were issued, or to whom addressed, does not appear; but, upon such authority, it must be presumed that they were actually issued. It is, however, no violation of the respect due to that authority to inquire what was the result or effect of those directions so given; what followed in obedience to them in any public and binding form. And I fear I am compelled to say that nothing of the kind followed, and that the directions must have slept in the portfolio of the office to which they were addressed; for it is, I think, impossible that if any public and authoritative ordinance had followed, it could have escaped the sleepless attention of many persons in our own country, to all public foreign proceedings upon this interesting subject. Still less would it have escaped the notice of the British resident minister, who, at the distance of a year and a half, is compelled, on the part of his own court, to express a curiosity to know what laws, ordinances, instructions, and other public and ostensible acts, had passed for the abolition of the slave trade.

27*] *"On the 30th of November, in the same year (1815), the additional article of the definitive treaty, a very solemn instrument, most undoubtedly, if formally and publicly executed, and it is in these terms: 'The high contracting parties, sincerely desiring to give effect to the measures on which they deliberated at the congress of Vienna, for the complete and universal abolition of the slave trade, and having each, in their respective dominions, prohibited, without restriction, their colonies and subjects from taking any part whatever in this traffic, engage to renew, conjointly, their efforts, with a view to insure final success to the principle which they proclaimed in the declaration of the 8th of February, 1815, and to concert, without loss of time, by their ministers at the court of London, the most effectual measures for the entire and definitive abolition of the traffic, so odious and so highly reproved by the laws of religion and nature.'

"Now, what are the effects of this treaty? According to the view I take of it, they are two, and two only; one declaratory of a fact, the other promissory of future measures. It is to be observed that the treaty itself does not abolish the slave trade; it does not inform the subjects that that trade is hereby abolished, and that, by virtue of the prohibitions therein contained, its subjects shall not, in future, carry on the trade; but the contracting parties mutually inform each other of the fact that they have, in their respective dominions, abolished the slave trade, without stating at all, the mode in which that abolition had taken place."

"It next engages to take future measures for the universal abolition.

"That, with respect to both the declaratory and promissory parts, Great Britain has acted with the optima fides, is known to the whole world, which has witnessed its domestic laws, as well as its foreign negotiations.

"I am very far from intimating that the government of this country did not act with perfect propriety in accepting the assurance that the French government had actually abolished the slave trade, as a sufficient proof of the fact; but the fact is now denied by a person who has a right to deny it; for, though a French subject, he is not bound to acknowledge the existence of any law which has not publicly appeared; and the other party having taken upon himself the burthen of proving it in the course of a legal inquiry, the court is compelled to demand and expect the ordinary evidence of such a disputed fact. It was not till the 15th of January, in the present year (1817), that the British resident minister applies for the communication I have described, of all laws, instructions, ordinances, and so on; he receives in return what is delivered *by the [*28 French minister as the ordinance, bearing date only one week before the requested communication, namely, the 8th of January. It has been asserted, in argument, that no such ordinance has yet, up to this very hour, even appeared in any printed or public form, however much it might import both French subjects, and the subjects of foreign states, so to receive it.

"How the fact may be, I cannot say; but I observe it appears before me in a manuscript form; and by inquiry at the Secretary of State's office, I find it exists there in no other plight or condition.

"In transmitting this to the British government, the British minister observes it is not the document he had reason to expect; and, certainly, with much propriety; for how does the document answer his requisition? His requisition is for all laws, ordinances, instructions, and so forth. How does this, a simple ordinance, professing to have passed only a week before, realize the assurance given on the 30th of July, 1815, that the traffic 'should cease, from the present time, everywhere and forever?' or how does this realize the promise made in November, that measures should be taken, without loss of time, to prohibit not only French colonists, but French subjects likewise, from taking any part whatever in this traffic? What is this regulation in substance? Why, it is a mere prospective colonial regulation, prohibiting the importation of slaves into the French colonies from the 8th of January, 1817.

"Consistently with this regulation, even if it does exist, in the form and with the force of a law, French subjects may be yet the common carriers of slaves to any foreign settlement that will admit them, and may devote their capital and their industry, unmolested by law, to the supply of any such markets.

"Supposing, however, the regulations to contain the fullest and most entire fulfillment of the engagement of France, both in time and in substance, what possible application can a prospective regulation of January, 1817, have to a transaction of March, 1816?

"Nobody is now to be told that a modern edict which does not appear, cannot be presumed; and that no penal law of any state can bind the conduct of its subjects, unless it is conveyed to their attention in a way which excludes the possibility of honest ignorance. The very production of a law professing to be enacted in the beginning of 1817, is a satisfactory proof that no such law existed in 1816, the year of this transaction. In short, the seizor has entirely failed in the task he has undertaken, in proving the existence of a prohibitory law, enacted by the legal government of France, which can be applied to the present transaction."

Report of the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade; made in the House of Representatives, April 12, 1822.

The committee on the suppression of the slave trade, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 15th of January last, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting that traffic have been duly executed; also, in the general operation thereof; and, if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor; and to whom many memorials have been referred touching the same subject; have, according to order, had the said resolution and memorials under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That, under the just and liberal construction put by the Executive on the act of Congress of March 3d, 1819, and that of the 15th of May, 1820, inflicting the punishment of piracy on the African slave trade, a foundation has been laid for the most systematic and vigorous application of the power of the United States, to the suppression of that iniquitous traffic. Its unhappy subjects, when captured, are restored to their country, agents are there appointed to receive them, and a colony, the offspring of private charity, is rising on its shores, in which such as cannot reach their native tribes, will find the means of alleviating the calamities they may have endured before their liberation.

When these humane provisions are contrasted with the system which they supersede, there can be but one sentiment in favor of a steady adherence to their support. The document accompanying this report, and marked A, states the number of Africans seized or taken within or without the limits of the United States, and brought there, and their present condition.

It does not appear to your committee that such part of the naval force of the country as has been hitherto employed in the execution of the laws against this traffic, could have been more effectually used for the interest and honor of the nation. The document marked B is a statement of the names of the vessels, and their commanders, ordered upon this service, with the dates of their departure, etc. The first vessel destined for this service arrived upon the 30*] coast of Africa in March, 1820, *and in the few weeks she remained there, sent in for adjudication four American vessels, all of which were condemned. The four which have been since employed in this service, have made five visits (the Alligator having made two cruises in the past summer), the whole of which have amounted to a service of about ten months by a single vessel; within a period of nearly two years; and since the middle of last November, the commencement of the healthy season on that coast, no vessel has been, nor, as your committee is informed, is under orders for that service.

The committee are thus particular on this branch of their inquiry, because unfounded rumors have been in circulation that other branches of the public service have suffered from the destination given to the inconsiderable force above stated, which, small as it has been, has, in every instance, been directed, both in its outward and homeward voyage, to cruise in the West India seas.

Before they quit this part of their inquiry, your committee feel it their duty to state that the loss of several of the prizes made in this service is imputable to the size of the ships engaged in it. The efficacy of this force, as well as the health and discipline of the officers and crews, conspire to recommend the employment of no smaller vessel than a corvette or a sloop of war, to which it would be expedient to allow the largest possible complement of men; and, if possible, she should be accompanied by a tender, or vessel drawing less water. The vessels engaged in this service should be frequently relieved, but the coast should at no time be left without a vessel to watch and protect its shores.

Your committee find it impossible to measure with precision the effect produced upon the American branch of the slave trade, by the laws above mentioned, and the seizures under them. They are unable to state, whether those American merchants, the American capital and seamen, which heretofore aided in this traffic, have abandoned it altogether, or have sought shelter under the flags of other nations. It is ascertained, however, that the American flag, which heretofore covered so large a portion of the slave trade, has wholly disappeared from the coasts of Africa. The trade, notwithstanding, increases annually, under the flags of other nations. France has incurred the reproach of being the greatest adventurer in this traffic, prohibited by her laws; but it is to be presumed that this results not so much from the avidity of her subjects for this iniquitous gain, as from the safety which, in the absence of all hazard of capture, her flag affords to the greedy and unprincipled adventurers of all nations. It is neither candid nor just to impute to a gallant and high-minded people the exclusive commission of crimes, which the abandoned *of [*31 all nations are alike capable of perpetrating, with the additional wrong to France herself, of using her flag to cover and protect them. If the vigor of the American navy has saved its banner from like reproach, it has done much to preserve unsullied its high reputation, and amply repaid the expense charged upon the public revenue by a system of laws to which it has given such honorable effect.

But the conclusion to which your committee has arrived, after consulting all the evidence within their reach, is, that the African slave trade now prevails to a great extent, and that its total suppression can never be effected by the separate and disunited efforts of one or more states; and as the resolution to which this report refers, requires the suggestion of some remedy for the defects, if any exist, in the system of laws for the suppression of this traffic, your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the report and accompanying documents submitted to the last Congress by the committee on the slave trade, and to make the same a part of this report. That report proposes, as a remedy for the existing evils of the system, the concurrence of the United States with one or all the maritime powers of Europe, in a modified and reciprocal right of search, on the African coast, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade.

It is with great delicacy that the committee have approached this subject, because they are aware that the remedy which they have presumed to recommend to the consideration of the House, requires the exercise of the power of another department of this government, and that objections to the exercise of this power, in the mode here proposed, have hitherto existed in that department.

Your committee are confident, however, that these objections apply rather to a particular proposition for the exchange of the right of search, than to that modification of it which presents itself to your committee. They contemplate the trial and condemnation of such American citizens as may be found engaged in this forbidden trade, not by mixed tribunals, sitting in a foreign country, but by existing courts of competent jurisdiction in the United States. They propose the same disposition of the captured Africans now authorized by law; and, least of all, their detention in America.

They contemplate an exchange of this right, which shall be in all respects reciprocal; an exchange which, deriving its sole authority from treaty, would exclude the pretension, which no nation, however, has presumed to set up, that this right can be derived from the law of nations; and further, they have limited it, in their 32*] conception of its application, *not only to certain latitudes, and to a certain distance from the coast of Africa, but to a small number of vessels to be employed by each power, and to be previously designated. The visit and search, thus restricted, it is believed, would insure the co-operation of one great maritime power, in the proposed exchange, and guard it from the danger of abuse.

Your committee cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted and peaceful concession by treaty, suggested by your committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity.

In closing this report, they recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution, viz.:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the slave trade.

The following resolution was submitted to the House of Representatives, on the 10th of February, 1823, and adopted the 28th of the same month:

Resolved, that the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and to prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation, as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

Spanish Decree.

"The introduction of negro slaves into America was one of the first measures which my predecessors dictated for the support and prosperity of those vast regions, soon after their discovery. The impossibility of inducing the Indians to engage in different useful though 33*] painful labors, *arising from their complete ignorance of the conveniences of life, and the very small progress they had made in the arts of social existence, required that the working of the mines, and the cultivation of the soil, should be committed to hands more robust and active than theirs.

This measure, which did not create slavery, but only took advantage of that which existed through the barbarity of the Africans, by saving from death their prisoners, and alleviating their sad condition, far from being prejudicial to the negroes transported to America, conferred upon them not only the incomparable blessing of being instructed in the knowledge of the true God, and of the only religion in which the Supreme Being desires to be adored by His creatures, but likewise all the advantages which accompany civilization without subjecting them, in their state of servitude, to a harder condition than that which they endured in freedom, when free in their native country. Nevertheless, the novelty of this system demanded prudence in its execution; and thus it happened that the introduction of negro slaves into America depended always on particular licenses, which my predecessors granted according to circumstances of places and times, till the era when untrained slaves were generally permitted to be imported, both in national and foreign vessels, by the royal proclamations of the 28th of September, 1789, the 12th of April, 1798, and the 22d of April, 1804; in each of which the different places for their introduction were determined. All this clearly evinced that the Christian wisdom of my predecessors considered always these provisions as exceptions to the law, and dependent on variable conditions. Although the license granted the 22d of April, 1804, had not expired, when Divine Providence restored me to the throne to which it had destined me, and of which an unjust usurper had perfidiously attempted to deprive me, the disturbances and dissensions excited in my American dominions, during my absence, immediately fixed my sovereign attention; and meditating incessantly on the most appropriate means of reestablishing good order in these remote possessions, and giving them all the encouragement of which they are capable, I was not slow in perceiving that the circumstances which had induced my predecessors to permit the traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa, and their introduction into both Americas, had entirely changed. In these provinces the number of indigenous negroes has increased prodigiously, and even that of free negroes, under the fostering care of a mild government, and the Christian humanity of the Spanish proprietors; the number of the white inhabitants has likewise been much augmented, and the climate is not now so prejudicial to the lat-34*] ter as it was before the *soil was cleared of wood, and subjected to cultivation. The advantage, likewise, which resulted to the inhabitants of Africa from their transporation to a civilized country, is not now so urgent or exclusive, since an enlightened nation has undertaken the glorious task of civilizing them in their own land. At the same time, the general progress of improvement in Europe, and the spirit of humanity which directed its late transactions, in restoring the political edifice which the wickedness of a usurped government had shaken to its foundation, have excited among European sovereigns a desire to see this traffic abolished; and at the Congress of Vienna, agreeing on the necessity of the abolition, they occupied themselves in facilitating its execution, by the most amicable negotiations with those powers which had colonies, meeting in me that disposition which became so laudable an undertaking. Those considerations moved my royal mind to inform itself from enlightened persons, zealous for the prosperity of my states, as to the effects which the abolition of the traffic would produce on them. Having seen their reports, and being desirous to attain certainty in a matter of so grave importance, I transmitted them to my council of the Indies, with my royal order, of the 14th of June, 1815, that it might communicate to me its opinion and advice. Having collected all these copious materials, and having examined the proposition which the same supreme tribunal laid before me in its deliberation of the 15th of February, 1816; answering to the confidence which I repose in it, and coinciding with its opinion respecting the abolition of the traffic in slaves; and co-operating with the King of Great Britain by a solemn treaty, embracing all the points of reciprocal interest, involved in this important transaction; and determining that the time for the abolition was arrived, the interest of my American states being duly reconciled with the sentiments of my royal mind, and the wishes of all the sovereigns, my friends and allies; I have decreed as follows:

"Art. 1. From this day forward, I prohibit all my subjects, both in the Peninsula and in America, from going to buy negroes on the coasts of Africa, north of the line. The negroes who may be bought on the said coasts shall be declared free in the first port of my dominions at which the ship in which they are transported shall arrive. The ship itself, together with the remainder of its cargo, shall be confiscated to the royal treasury, and the purchaser, the captain, the master, and pilot, shall be irrevocably condemned to ten years' transportation to the Philippines.

"Art. II. The above punishment does not attach to the trader, the *captain, the [*35 master, and pilot, of the vessels which sail from any port of my dominions, for the coasts of Africa, north of the line, before the 22d of November of the present year; to which period I grant, besides, an extension of six months, counting from the above date, to complete their voyages.

"Art. III. From the 30th of May, 1820, I equally prohibit all my subjects, as well in the Peninsula as in America, from going to purchase negroes along those parts of the coast of Africa which are to the south of the line, under the same penalties imposed in the first article of this decree; allowing, likewise, the space of five months from the above date to complete the voyages that may be undertaken before the above-mentioned 30th of May, in which the traffic in slaves shall cease in all my dominions, as well in Spain as in America.

"Art. IV. Those who, using the permission which I grant till the 30th of May, 1820, shall purchase slaves on that part of the coast of Africa which lies south of the line, shall not be allowed to carry more slaves than five to two tons of tonnage of their vessel; and any persons contravening this enactment shall be subjected to the penalty of losing all the slaves on board, who shall be declared free at the first port of my dominions in which the ship arrives.

"Art. V. This computation is made without a reference to those who may be born during the voyage, or to those who may be serving on board as sailors or servants.

"Art. VI. Foreign vessels, which may import negroes into any port of my dominions, shall be subjected to the regulations prescribed in this decree; and in case of contravening them, shall be subjected to the penalties contained in it.

"And, my royal pleasure being that the above decree should circulate in my dominions of America and Asia, for its punctual observance, I communicated it to my Supreme Council of the Indies, signed with my own hand, under date of the 22d of September last past; and on its being published in that tribunal the 1st instant, a resolution passed that steps should be taken to enforce it, and that the said tribunal should, for such purpose, circulate this, my royal cedula, by which I direct all my viceroys, presidents, courts of judicature, commandants-general, governors and intendants of the Indies, of the adjacent, and of the Philippine Islands, to keep, fulfill and execute, and cause to be kept, fufilled and executed, all that has been enjoined in this my sovereign determination, without transgressing or contravening, or permitting to be transgressed or contravened, its contents in any way; causing it, for that *purpose, to be published as an order, [*36 not only in the capital cities, but also in the chief towns of jurisdiction of their respective districts, and communicating it likewise, each in his territory, to the tribunals, justices, authorities and persons, who in any way may be bound to observe it. And this my royal cedula shall be attended to by the accountants'-general offices of my said council. Dated, Madrid, the ——— December, 1817.

"Your majesty prohibits forever all your subjects of the Peninsula as well as of America, from purchasing negroes on the coasts of Africa, enacting that voyages for that purpose may not be undertaken to the coasts north of the equator, after the 22d of November, nor to those south of the equator, after the 30th of May, 1820, under the penalties specified."[1]

Portuguese Edict.

"I, the King, make known to those to whom the present Alvará, having the force and effect of a law, shall come, that as the abolition of the slave trade in the ports of the coast of Africa, north of the equator, established by the ratification of the treaty, dated the 22d of January, 1815, and of the additional convention, dated the 28th of July, 1817, requires the adoption of fresh measures, which, fixing just and adequate penalties that shall attach to offenders, may afford to judges and other persons charged with the execution of those measures, a standard for deciding upon such cases as shall occur relative to this object, think proper to ordain as follows:

"Art. I. All persons, of whatsoever quality or condition, who shall proceed to fit out or prepare vessels for the traffic in slaves, in any part of the coast of Africa lying north of the equator, shall incur the penalty of the loss of the slaves, who shall be declared free, with a destination hereinafterwards mentioned. The vessels engaged in the traffic shall be confiscated, with all their tackle and appurtenances, together with the cargo, of whatever it may consist, which shall be on board on account of 37*] *the owners or freighters of such vessel, and of the owners of such slaves. The officers of such vessel—to wit, the captain or master, the pilot and supercargo—shall be banished for five years to Mozambique, and each shall pay a fine equivalent to the pay or other profits which he was to gain by the adventure. Policies of insurance cannot be made on such vessels, or their cargoes; and if they are made, the assurers who shall knowingly make them shall be condemned in triple the amount of the stipulated premium.

"Art. II. All persons, of whatever rank or condition, who shall import slaves into Brazil, in foreign vessels, shall incur the same penalty of the loss of the slaves, who shall become freemen, and be provided for as hereinafter directed.

"Art. III. Information shall be received relative to all the above cases. And if the vessel and her cargo have been confiscated, half of the whole proceeds of the property, sold by public auction, as well as half of the fines, shall be given to the informer, and the other half shall be paid into my royal treasury, to which the whole produce shall belong, if there be no informer. In case, however, of a vessel having been captured by a ship of war, such vessel and her cargo shall be subject to the provisions specified in the seventh article of the regulations concerning the mixed commission, annexed, under number 3, to the above convention of July the 28th, 1817. But in case the ship should be captured or confiscated, it shall not be lawful to commence an action for the recovery of such ship and cargo, except within a term not exceeding three years, to reckon from the date of the ship's entrance into the port where she has unloaded; after the expiration of which period, the said action shall be inadmissible and void.

"Art. IV. Informations, and all proceedings inclusive of the final sentence and execution, shall be brought before the judges appointed to try causes respecting contraband goods and embezzlement, in any place or district whither the slaves have been carried, or before any other magistrate or judge competent to decide on those matters, to whom I deem proper to commit this jurisdiction, as well as the authority requisite for carrying into execution the sentences passed by the mixed commission, in cases cognizable by the latter, and for trying and determining other cases that may occur, as also those accruing from them, allowing the party to bring an appeal conformably to the ordinance. It shall, however, be lawful for either of the parties to apply to the mixed commission, for them to determine whether or not the case have reference to the abolition; in which event, the proceedings upon it shall be delivered *up to the commission in the [*38 state in which they are; and whatever the commission may decide, shall be carried into effect.

"Art. V. The slaves made over to my royal treasury in the manner specified in the above seventh article of the regulations concerning the mixed commission, and those declared free by the above article (as it would be unjust to abandon them without support), shall be delivered into the office of the judge of the district, or where there is none, into that of the judge charged to watch over the rights of the Indians, whose powers I enlarge with that jurisdiction, to serve as freedmen for fourteen years in any public service of the navy, the fortresses, agriculture, or manual trades, as may be thought most convenient, being for that purpose enrolled in the respective stations; or shall be hired out to individuals of known property and probity, who shall be bound to support, clothe, and instruct them, teaching them some handicraft or labor that may be agreed upon, during the stipulated period; the terms and the conditions of which shall be renewed as often as necessary till the fourteen years are expired; the time of servitude may be shortened by two or more years, according as the good conduct of these persons may entitle them to the enjoyment of full freedom. In case these freedmen are destined for the public service, the officer who shall have authority in the respective stations to which they are assigned shall nominate a proper person to fix the period as above mentioned, who shall be responsible for their education and treatment. They shall have as curator a person of known probity, who shall be nominated every three years by the judge, and approved by the judicial council or governor, and captain-general of the province. To him it shall belong to provide everything which may contribute to their well-being, to testify abuses that may affect them, to procure their release after their proper term of service, and enforce generally, for their benefit, the observance of the laws prescribed for the protection of orphans, in as far as those laws are applicable to them, to the end that whatever is ordered concerning them may be strictly executed.

"Art. VI. In the ports to the south of the equator, where the traffic in slaves is still permitted, the regulations passed in the law of the 24th of November, 1813, shall be observed, with the following modifications: The distinction between vessels which shall exceed or shall not exceed 201 tons shall be abolished, and the number of slaves shall be regulated according to the tonnage of the vessel, in the proportion of five to every two tons, according to the ancient measure. The prohibition respecting marks made with iron on the body of the slaves, shall 39*] not extend to *marks imprinted with silver carimbos, which, being excepted, shall be permitted. It shall be allowed to the persons who own or freight slave vessels, to use, indiscriminately, iron or copper kettles, provided the latter every voyage be tinned anew, which shall be ascertained by proper officers visiting those vessels. If surgeons do not sail on board such vessels, on account of the impossibility of procuring them, or for some other reason equally conclusive, the owners shall be obliged to carry with them black sangradores, experienced in the treatment of the diseases with which the slaves are commonly afflicted, and, in the remedies proper for curing them; because, in regard to all these objects, experience has evinced the necessity of specifying the provisions set forth in this Alvará, which, under the above modifications, shall be observed in all its details.

"Art. VII. Whereas, the alteration affected in the slave trade by the restrictions contained in the above treaty and additional convention requires considerable modifications in the provisions of the former laws enacted on this subject, independent of the last change, which will tend to render many of them void, I think proper to order that it shall be permitted to import into the ports of Brazil, slaves from any ports where this traffic is not prohibited, and that the freight shall continue to be settled by the parties.

"The present injunctions shall be strictly complied with; wherefore I direct the Tribunal of the Privy Council, of Conscience and of Orders; the President of my Royal Exchequer; the Council of my Royal Treasury; the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Appeals in Brazil; the President of the Tribunal of Bahia; the Governors and Captains-General; and the other Governors of Brazil, and of my dominions beyond sea; also all the Ministers of Justice, and other persons whom the present Alvará may concern, to comply with and observe the same, notwithstanding any decision that may be at variance with it, and which I rescind for this end only; and it shall have the force and effect of a letter issued by the Chancellery, though it be not actually issued by the same, and though its validity extend beyond a year, notwithstanding the law to the contrary. Given at the palace of Rio de Janeiro, the 28th of January, 1818."

Cases referred to in the argument of the Antelope.

The Amedie, 1 Acton's Rep., 240.

This was an American vessel captured by a British cruiser, in the latter part of the year 1807, on her way from Bonny, on the coast of Africa, to Mantanzas, in the Island of Cuba, with 105 slaves on board. She was libeled in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Tortola, and condemned as engaged in an illegal trade. From this sentence an appeal was prosecuted to the High Court of Appeals.

The first reason assigned by the captors for the condemnation of this vessel was, that "this ship was proceeding from Africa, with a cargo there laden, to Mantanzas, in the Island of Cuba, being a part of a colony then belonging to His Majesty's enemies, contrary to the prohibitions of the order of His Majesty in council, of the 11th day of November, 1807."

The second reason assigned was, that "the voyage was contrary to the prohibitory laws of the United States of America, made for abolishing the slave trade, which had been officially notified to the Lords of Appeal by the act of the American government in the case of The Chance, Brown, master; and although such laws of a foreign state may not amount to a direct or substantive ground of condemnation in a court of prize, yet they may and ought to exclude an American claimant from the benefit of those relaxations of the law of war which, in favor of neutral states, have been introduced by His Majesty's instructions, in regard to their commerce with the colonies of His Majesty's enemies; a privilege which can only be understood to be granted to neutral governments as a branch of their national commerce, and not as an invitation to lawless individuals to engage in a trade which the neutral state itself has prohibited, and desires to discourage."

The third ground of condemnation assigned by the captors was, "that Scott, the supercargo and lader of the slaves, is admitted to have an interest therein, which is liable to confiscation, he being a British subject, by the statute of 46 Geo. III., cap. 52."

Judgment.—Sir Wm. Grant: in the case of

The Amedie, it must be considered, on the evidence produced to the court, and from the 41*] situation *of this vessel at the time of capture, that she was employed in carrying slaves from the coast of Africa to a Spanish colony. We are of opinion this appears to have been the original design and purpose of the voyage, notwithstanding the pretense set up to veil the real intention of the proprietor. The American claimant, however, complains of the injury and interruption he has sustained in carrying on his usual and lawful trade, that of importing slaves for the purpose of sale, and calls upon the Prize Court to redress the grievance, and repair the damage he has sustained by the capture and unjust detention of this vessel.

On the different occasions when cases of this description formerly came before the court, the slave trade was liable to considerations very different from those which now belong to it. So far as respected the transportation of slaves to the colonies of foreign nations, this trade has been prohibited by the laws of America only; this country had taken no notice of that prohibition; our law sanctioned the trade, which it was the policy of the American law first to restrict, and finally to abolish. It appeared to us, therefore, difficult to consider the prohibitory law of America in any other light than as one of those municipal regulations of a foreign state, of which this court could not take any cognizance, and of course could not be called upon to enforce; nor could it possibly bar a party in a court of prize. But by the alteration which has since taken place in our law, the question stands now upon very different grounds. We do now, and did at the time of this capture, take an interest in preventing that traffic in which this ship was engaged. The slave trade has since been totally abolished in this country, and our legislature has declared the African slave trade is contrary to the principles of justice and humanity. Whatever opinions, as private individuals, we before might have entertained upon the nature of this trade, no court of justice could with propriety have assumed such a position as the basis of any of its decisions, whilst it was permitted by our own law; but we do now lay down as a principle, that this is a trade which cannot, abstractedly speaking, be said to have a legitimate existence; I say abstractedly speaking, because we cannot legislate for other countries; nor has this country a right to control any foreign legislature that may think proper to dissent from this doctrine, and give permission to its subjects to prosecute this trade. We cannot, certainly, compel the subjects of other nations to observe any other than the first and generally received principles of universal law. But thus far we are now entitled to act, according to our law, and to hold that, prima facie, the trade is altogether illegal, and thus to throw on a claimant the whole burden of proof; *in order to show that, [*42 by the particular law of his own country he is entitled to carry on this traffic. As the case now stands, we think that no claimant can be heard in an application to a court of prize for the restoration of the human beings he carried unjustly to another country, for the purpose of disposing of them as slaves. The consequence of making such proof is not now necessary to determine; but where it cannot be made, the party must be considered to have failed in establishing his asserted right. We are of opinion, upon the whole, that persons engaged in such a trade cannot, upon principles of universal law, have a right to be heard upon a claim of this nature in any court. In the present case, the claimant does not bring himself within the protection of the law of his own country; he appears to have been acting in direct violation of that law, which admits of no right of property such as he claims; ours is express and satisfactory upon the subject.

Where, therefore, there is no right established to carry on this trade, no claim to restitution of this property can be admitted. We are hence of opinion the sentence of the court below was valid, and ought to be affirmed.

The Fortuna, 1 Dodson's Rep., 81.

This was the case of a vessel bearing the Portuguese flag, captured by a British cruiser, in October, 1810, and sent into Plymouth as prize.

It appeared in evidence that she sailed from New York, under American colors, in the month of July, 1810; and ostensibly owned by an American citizen; that she went to Madeira, landed a part of her cargo, and about a week before her departure from thence, a bill of sale of the ship was executed to a native of Madeira, a Portuguese subject; and in consequence of this sale, Portuguese papers obtained, and the portuguese flag assumed. It appeared, from an inspection of the vessel, and other evidence in the case, that the object of the voyage was to procure a cargo of slaves on the coast of Africa.

Judgment.— Sir William Scott: "An American ship, quasi American, is entitled, upon proof, to immediate restitution; but she may forfeit, as other neutral ships may, that title, by various acts of misconduct, by violation of belligerent rights most clearly and universally. But though this prize law looks primarily to violations of belligerent rights as grounds of confiscation in vessels not actually belonging to the enemy, it has extended itself a good deal beyond considerations of that description *only. It has been established, by recent [*43 decisions of the Supreme Court, that the court of prize, though properly a court purely of the law of nations, has a right to notice the municipal law of this country in the case of a British vessel, which, in the course of a prize proceeding, appears to have been trading in violation of that law, and to reject a claim for her on that account. That principle has been incorporated into the prize law of this country within the last twenty years, and seems now fully incorporated. A late decision, in the case of The Amedie, seems to have gone the length of establishing a principle. that any trade contrary to the general law of nations, although not tending to, or accompanied with, any infraction of the belligerent rights of that country, whose tribunals are called upon to consider it, may subject the vessel employed in that trade to confiscation. The Amedie was an American ship, employed in carrying on the slave trade; a trade which this country since its own abandonment of it, has deemed repugnant to the law of nations, to justice and humanity, though without presuming so to consider and treat it, where it occurs in the practice of the subjects of a state which continues to tolerate and protect it by its own municipal regulations; but it puts upon the parties who are found in the occupations of that trade, the burthen of showing that it was so tolerated and protected; and, on failure of producing such proof, proceeds to condemnation, as it did in the case of that vessel. How far that judgment has been universally concurred in and approved, is not for me to inquire. If there be those who disapprove it, I am certainly not at liberty to include myself in that number, because the decisions of that court bind authoritatively the judicial conscience of this; its decisions must be conformed to, and its principles practically adopted. The principle laid down in that case appears to be, that the slave trade, carried on by a vessel belonging to a subject of the United States, is a trade which, being unprotected by the domestic regulations of their legislature and government, subjects the vessel engaged in it to a sentence of condemnation. If the ship should therefore turn out to be an American actually so employed—and it matters not, in my opinion, in what stage of the employment, whether in the inception or the consummation of it—the case of The Amedie will bind the conscience of this court to the effect of compelling it to pronounce a sentence of confiscation."

"I can have no rational doubt of her (The Fortuna's) real character; and, under the authority of the case of The Amedie, I condemn her and her cargo."

44*] *The Donna Marianna, 1 Dodson's Rep. 91.

This was the case of a vessel seized as she was proceeding to Cape Coast for a cargo of slaves, under the Portuguese flag. It appeared in evidence that she was originally an American vessel, had been bona fide sold to a British subject, and was now claimed as Portuguese property on the ground that she had been since conveyed to a Portuguese merchant. The court condemned the ship, as being a British vessel engaged in the slave trade.

Sir William Scott: "It would be a monstrous thing, where a ship, admitted to have been at one time British property, is found engaging in this traffic, to say that however imperfect the documentary evidence of the asserted transfer may be, and however startling the other circumstances of the case, no inquiry shall be made into the real ownership. Here are on board this vessel only papers of mere form, and which are in contradiction with each other, leaving the whole transaction of the transfer in great doubt and obscurity; and if the court were to be prohibited, under such circumstances, from inquiry into the reality of the Portuguese title, one sees how easily the provisions of the legislature would be defeated."

"I can have no doubt that this court is bound judicially to consider this as a British vessel, and that this Portuguese disguise has been assumed for the mere purpose of protecting the property of British merchants in a traffic which it was not lawful for them to engage in."

The Diana, 1 Dodson's Rep. 95.

This was the case of a vessel, under Swedish colors, seized at Cape Mount, on the coast of Africa, on the 10th of September, 1810, by a British cruiser, and carried to Sierra Leone, where proceedings were instituted against the vessel and cargo. At the time of the seizure she had exchanged her outward cargo for 120 slaves, part of which she had received on board. An information was filed on the part of the captors, and a claim made for the ship and cargo, as the property of a subject of the King of Sweden. The vessel and cargo were condemned in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Sierra Leone, from which an appeal was prosecuted to the High Court of Admiralty.

The condemnation also took place on a principle which this court cannot in any manner recognize, inasmuch as the sentence affirms 45*] *"that the slave trade, from motives of humanity, hath been abolished by most civilized nations, and it is not at the present time legally authorized by any." This appears to me to be an assertion by no means sustainable. This court is disposed to go as far in discountenancing this odious traffic as the law of nations and the principles recognized by English tribunals, will warrant it in doing, but beyond these principles it does not feel itself at liberty to travel. It cannot proceed on a sweeping anathema of this kind against property belonging to the subjects of foreign independent states. The position laid down in the sentence of the court below, that the slave trade is not authorized by any civilized state, is, unfortunately, by means correct, the contrary being notoriously the fact, that it is tolerated by some of them. This trade was at one time we know, universally allowed by the different nations of Europe, and carried on by them to a greater or less extent, according to their respective necessities. Sweden, having but small colonial possessions, did not engage very deeply in the traffic, but she entered into it so far as her convenience required for the supply of her own colonies. The trade, which was generally allowed, has been since abolished by some particular countries; but I am yet to learn that Sweden[1] has prohibited its subjects from engag-

1.—The treaty of concert and subsidy between His Majesty and the King of Sweden, which was signed at Stockholm on the 3d of March, 1813, has been made public since the date of this judgment. By an article of this treaty, the King of Sweden engages "to forbid and prohibit, at the period of ing in the traffic, or that she has abstained from it either in act or declaration. Our own country, it is true, has taken a more correct view of the subject, and has decreed the abolition of the slave trade, as far as British subjects are concerned; but it claims no right of enforcing its prohibition against the subjects of those states which have not adopted the same opinion with respect to the injustice and immorality of the trade.

The principle which has been extracted by the judge of the court below, from the case of The Amedie, is the reverse of the real principle there laid down by the Superior Court, which was, that where the municipal laws of the country to which the parties belong have prohibited the trade, the tribunals of this country will hold it to be illegal, upon the general prin-46*] ciples *of justice and humanity, and refuse restitution of the property; but on the other hand, though they consider the trade to be generally contrary to the principles of justice and humanity, where not tolerated by the laws of the country, they will respect the property of persons engaged in it under the sanction of the laws of their own country. The Lords of Appeal did not mean to set themselves up as legislators for the whole world, or presume in any manner to interfere with the commercial regulations of other states, or to lay down general principles that were to overthrow their legislative provisions with respect to the conduct of their own subjects. It is highly fit that the judge of the court below should be corrected in the view which he has taken of this matter, since the doctrine laid down by him in this sentence is inconsistent with the peace of this country and the rights of other states.

The proceedings of this court, as of appeal, have been commenced and carried on by both parties in the manner in which instance causes are usually conducted. A libel has been brought on the one side, to which a negative issue has been given on the other. Objections, however, have been taken to the jurisdiction, upon two grounds. In the first place it has been said that the sentence of the court below, condemning the property of the crown, was a prize sentence, and, consequently, that the appeal ought to have been made to the Privy Council, and not to the Instance Court of Admiralty, which is a mere municipal tribunal. It has likewise been said that, supposing this court to be possessed of an appellate jurisdiction, still it has no jurisdiction over the question itself, which depends altogether upon the jus gentium. But I think the proceedings of the parties have sufficiently founded the jurisdiction in the cause; and I am by no means clear that a court of civil jurisdiction might not otherwise have adjudicated on a question of this kind, and have excluded a claim asserted to be founded on principles contrary to general justice. The general injustice of a claim may be the subject of cognizance in a municipal court; a claim founded on privacy, or any other act which, in the general estimation of mankind, is held to be illegal and immoral, might, I presume, be rejected in any court upon that ground alone. I am of opinion, therefore, that neither of the objections which have been taken are founded. After issue has been given here by the captors, as in an instance court, they cannot object to the competency of the court to entertain the question; and I am by no means willing to put the parties to the expense and inconvenience of commencing proceedings de novo before another tribunal.

On the part of the appellants it is, I think, sufficiently established in *evidence, that [*47 the ship and cargo are Swedish property; whilst, on the other side, there is nothing but a general suggestion that they may belong to American citizens. It may, perhaps, be true, that persons of that country have dishonestly engage themselves in this traffic under color of the Swedish flag, and the Island of St. Bartholomew may be a convenient resort for such an illegal purpose; but there is nothing in this particular case which can lead to a grave suspicion, much less to a legal conclusion, that this ship is not bonæ fidei the property of Swedish subjects.

The question, then, is, whether the slave trade is permitted by the law of Sweden. I have before stated that this trade was, till of late years, generally allowed by the tastes of Europe, when, from motives of humanity, some of them were induced to abolish it, as far as their own subjects were concerned. It does not appear that anything has been done by Sweden in the way of abjuring it, much less that she has issued any positive declaration to that effect. The court is certainly inclined to hold that it lies on the individual making the claim to show that the law of his country countenances the trade; but, in this particular instance, that demand appears to be satisfied; sufficiently, at least, to throw on the other party the onus of proving that it is not so allowed. The indorsement upon the past, signed by the Swedish governor, that this vessel was "bound to the coast of Guinea, for slaves," raises a presumption of the legality of the trade, and shifts the burthen of proof from the claimant to the captor. It is not necessary that there should be an immediate act of the Swedish government itself on board, declaring what the precise state of the law may be; the court is bound to accept the declaration and authority of the governor, as it appears upon the pass, if not contradicted. I do not find that the authenticity of this pass is at all denied by the judge of the court below; he goes on the broad and sweeping ground that all dealing in slaves is unlawful, because the trade is not authorized by any civilized state, which is certainly an incorrect and erroneous statement. If the captors had it in their power to prove that Sweden had abolished this trade, they should now have produced that proof; for they must have been aware that the sentence of the judge could never be supported on the principles stated by him in his judgment. The sanction of the colonial governor has been produced by the claimants; and I the cession of Guadaloupe, the introduction of slaves from Africa into the said island, and the other possessions in the West Indies of His Swedish Majesty, and not to permit Swedish subjects to engage in the slave trade; an engagement which (it is said) His Swedish Majesty is the more willing to contract, as this traffic has never been authorized by him," though it had never been prohibited, and therefore had been tolerated in practice upon the principles then generally received.

am clearly of opinion, under this authority standing before me, and standing uncontradicted, that Sweden has not abolished the slave trade.

48*] *The King's Advocate: From private information, I understand that Sweden never, at any time, engaged in this trade.

Court: Have you any documents to produce by which that fact can be made to appear? Can I presume, that the Swedish governor, who granted this pass, was acting contrary to the laws of his own country? It is impossible for me, upon mere private information, to say that such was the fact. If anything can be produced in the way of evidence, it must be offered to the court before which this case may be carried on appeal. With every disposition to sustain the disinclination which has of late been justly shown to the slave trade, I feel myself under a necessity of reversing this sentence, which appears to be founded on a false and dangerous principle, inconsistent with the rights of independent states, and, consequently, with the peace and safety of this country.

The only remaining point is, respecting these few Portuguese slaves which were found on board the ship. It appears that they belong to the master of the Portuguese schooner, which had been lying at Cape Mount, but was driven to sea by stress of weather whilst he was on shore, and that himself and his slaves had been taken on board this ship out of charity. In the absence of all proof I shall not presume that he had been acting in opposition to the laws of his own country, and the treaty relative to the slave trade between Great Britain and Portugal.

Madrazo v. Willes, 5 Sergt. & Lowb., 313.

A foreigner, who is not prohibited from carrying on the slave trade by the laws of his own country, may, in a British court of justice, recover damages sustained by him in respect of the wrongful seizure, by a British subject, of a cargo of slaves on board of a ship then employed by him in carrying on the African slave trade.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a subject of the King of Spain, and that on the 12th of July, 1817, at Havana, in the Island of Cuba, he was lawfully possessed of a certain brig, called, etc., and continued so possessed until the committing of the trespasses after mentioned, to wit, at, etc.; and that the said brig was, to wit, on, etc., lawfully cleared out for a certain voyage in the slave trade, to wit, from Havana to the coast of Africa, and back; and that, on the 16th of January, 1818, on the high seas, to wit, off Cape St. Paul's, on the coast of Africa, defendant, with force and arms, seized the said brig, together with her stores, etc., and 300 slaves, and also divers goods, etc., on board of the said brig, and kept and detained them for a long time 49*] *and converted and disposed of the slaves, goods, etc., to his own use; by means whereof the said brig was prevented from further prosecuting the said voyage, and the plaintiff deprived of great gains which would have accrued from the slaves and goods, and from taking on board other slaves and other goods, and from carrying them to the Island of Cuba. Plea, not guilty. At the trial at the last London sittings after Michaelmas term, it appeared that the defendant, who was a captain in the royal navy, had, on the 16th of January, 1818, off Cape St. Paul's, unlawfully taken possession of the ship of the plaintiff, a Spanish merchant, which was engaged in the slave trade on the coast of Africa. The only question which arose was as to the amount of damages. It occurred to the Lord Chief Justice at the trial, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the value of the slaves in an English court of justice; and accordingly he desired the jury to find their verdict separately for each part of the damage, giving to the defendant liberty to move to reduce the verdict to the smaller sum, in case the court should agree with him on the point. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £21,180; being for the deterioration of the ship's stores and goods, £3,000, and for the supposed profit of the cargo of slaves, £18,180. And now, Jervis moved for a rule nisi to reduce the damages to £3,000. By the 47 Geo. III., c. 36, the slave trade, and all dealings connected with it, were declared unlawful. It follows, therefore, as a consequence, that no one can be allowed to recover damages in respect of a cargo of slaves. And the 51 Geo. III., c. 23, goes still further, for it declares that trade to be contrary to the principles of justice, humanity and sound policy. Now, it being the duty of English courts of justice to be guided by those principles, no one, whether he be a foreigner or an Englishman, can be permitted there to claim any compensation in respect of such a traffic. The 58 Geo. III., c. 36, is, indeed relied on by the other side; but that act, which was passed with a view of carrying into effect a treaty with Spain on this subject, ought not to affect the present question. Indeed, the fourth article of the treaty is strongly in favor of the defendant; for it provides that the British government shall make compensation, out of a sum provided by parliament to Spanish merchants, for the seizure of their ships, which would seem to prove that, independently of that, such merchants had no other remedy.

Abbott, C. J. On further consideration, it appears to me that there is no sufficient ground for reducing this verdict to the smallest sum found by the jury. Considering the very extensive language used in the two *acts of [*50 parliament to which we have been referred, I had at first thought that it was not competent, even for a foreigner, to come into an English court of justice and there to recover damages for a loss sustained by him in the prosecution of a trade declared by the British legislature, in such strong language, to be unlawful. It was with that view that I directed the jury to separate the damages in this case; for it occurred to me, that though the plaintiff might not be entitled to recover for the slaves, still, inasmuch as, at all events, the defendant ought to have taken away the slaves promptly, if at all, the subsequent detention of the ship was an injury, for which the plaintiff was entitled to compensation. But I am now satisfied that the words used by the legislature, although large and extensive, can only be taken to be applicable to British subjects. By the 58 Geo. III., c. 36, it appears that a treaty had been made with Spain, for the prohibition of an important branch of the trade; and that, with regard to the remainder, special provisions had been made, and a special court constituted for the purpose of settling the disputes which might occur. Now, that shows most strongly, that but for such a treaty, the trade would have been perfectly legal in a Spaniard; and the 10th section of that act, by which a certain sum is provided as a full compensation for all losses sustained in consequence of the seizure of vessels previously to the ratification of that treaty, seems to me to corroborate most strongly this view of the subject; for it enables the parties sued to plead that clause in bar of the action, which would obviously have been unnecessary, if under the previous acts no action could have been maintained at all. This clause, therefore, seems to me to be a legislative recognition of a foreigner's right of suit. And by the 11th and 12th sections it is provided that all suits commenced in the courts of admiralty shall proceed, if commenced; and that the damages, etc., when recovered, shall be paid to the government of this country. All these clauses, taken together, appear to me to show that what occurred to me at nisi prius, was not a sound exposition of the law. I am therefore of opinion that the verdict for the larger sum found by the jury is right, and that we ought to refuse this rule.

Bayley, J. I do not think that there is sufficient doubt in this case to induce us to grant a rule. A British court of justice is always open to the subjects of all countries in amity with us, and they are entitled to compensation for any wrongful act done by a British subject to them. It is no answer to the present action to say that it would not be maintainable by a British subject; for the only questions are, whether the act of the defendant be wrongful, and what injury the plaintiff 51*] has sustained *from it. Although the language used by the legislature, in the statute referred to, is undoubtedly very strong, yet it can only apply to British subjects, and can only render the slave trade unlawful if carried on by them; it cannot apply, in any way, to a foreigner. It is true, that if this were a trade contrary to the law of nations, a foreigner could not maintain this action. But it is not; and as a Spaniard cannot be considered as bound by the acts of the British legislature prohibiting this trade, it would be unjust to deprive him of a remedy for the wrong which he has sustained. He had a legal property in the slaves, of which he has, by the defendant's act, been deprived. The 58 Geo. III., c. 36, proceeds on this principle; and the provisions referred to by my Lord Chief Justice seem to me to be conclusive on the subject. I think, therefore, that we ought not to disturb this verdict.

Holroyd, J. However much I may regret that any damages can be recoverable for such a subject as this, yet I think we are bound to say that this plaintiff is entitled to them. I agree with the construction which has been put on the 58 Geo. III., c. 36; and I think, that even independently of that act, the action would have been maintainable for the loss of the slaves.

Best, J. The statutes which have been referred to, speak in just terms of indignation of the horrible traffic in human beings; but they speak only in the name of the British nation. The declaration of the British legislature, that the slave trade is contrary to justice and humanity, cannot affect the subjects of other countries, or prevent them from carrying on this trade out of the limits of the British dominions. The assertion of a right to control the subjects of other states in this respect, would be inconsistent with that independence which we acknowledge that every foreign government possesses. If a ship be acting contrary to the general law of nations, she is thereby subject to confiscation; but it is impossible to say that the slave trade is contrary to what may be called the common law of nations. It was, until lately, carried on by all the nations of Europe. A practice so sanctioned can only be rendered illegal by the consent of all the powers. Most of the states of Christendom have now consented to the abolition of the slave trade, and concurred with us in declaring it to be unjust and inhuman. The subjects of any of these states could not, I think, maintain an action in the courts of this country for any injury happening to them in the prosecution of this trade; but Spain has reserved to herself a right of carrying *it on in that [*52 part of the world where this transaction occurred. Her subjects could not legally be interrupted in buying slaves in that part of the globe, and have a right to appeal to the justice of this country for an injury sustained by them from such an interruption. These principles are confirmed by the decisions of the Court of Admiralty, and also by a judgment of Sir William Grant, pronounced at the cockpit. The cases to which I allude are, The Fortuna. The Donna Marianna, and The Diana, in the Admiralty Court; and The Amedie, before the privy council. (Dodson's Ad. Rep. 81, 91, 95.) These cases establish this rule, that ships which belong to countries that have prohibited the slave trade, are liable to capture and condemnation, if found employed in such trade; but that the subjects of countries which permit the prosecution of this trade cannot be interrupted while carrying it on. It is clear, from these authorities, that the slave trade is not condemned by the general law of nations. The subjects of Spain have only to look to the municipal laws of their own country, and cannot be affected by any laws made by our government. The rule for reducing the damages, in this case, must therefore be refused.

Rule refused.

ON THE

X WHEATON.

10 Wheat. 1-50, 60 L. Ed. 253, WAYMAN v. SOUTHARD.

Supreme Court has jurisdiction when case is adjourned from circuit of only those points on which judges were divided.

Approved in Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 435, 17 L. Ed. 323, where court refused to pass on questions not involved in points certified; dissenting opinion in Dow v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 173, 25 L. Ed. 638, arguing that court did not have jurisdiction except as to specific points on which judges were divided; Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 616, 28 L. Ed. 1108, 5 Sup. Ct. 621, denying jurisdiction where certificate presented mixed questions of law and fact and involved merits of controversy; dissenting opinion in Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 206, 8 L. Ed. 98, to point that jurisdiction of court over causes sent up on certificate of division should be strictly construed; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 406, Fed. Cas. 764, arguendo.

Definiteness of question to be certified. Note, 31 L. R. A. 395.

Under general grant of power to carry enumerated powers into execution, Congress can make laws to carry Federal judgments into execution.

Cited in Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 24 How. 384, 16 L. Ed. 738, holding Congress could pass laws authorizing Federal courts to issue mandamus to compel county officers to levy a tax for purpose of satisfying judgment of said court against the county; Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. 187, 18 L. Ed. 773, holding Congress could make laws authorizing Federal courts to compel defendant county to levy tax to satisfy judgment of such court, notwithstanding injunction from State court to prevent such levy; United States v. Drennan, Hempst. 325, Fed. Cas. 14,992, to point that Congress having exercised its power to make laws carrying into execution Federal court judgments, United States could proceed to satisfy judgment in its favor against deceased's estate, notwithstanding local probate law; Bank v. Thompson, 173 Ill. 599, 64 Am. St. Rep. 140, 50 N. E. 1090, holding Congress had power to adopt State laws relating to process and executions, and adoption of Illinois law, making lien of judgment of State courts coextensive with their jurisdictions, made lien of judgments of Federal courts in Illinois coextensive with their jurisdictions; Thayer v. Hedges, 23 Ind. 146, upholding power of Congress to provide for issue of legal tender treasury notes; Lafayette etc. R. R. Co. v. Geiger, 34 Ind. 213, holding, where State legislature has power to authorize counties to subscribe for stock, it has power by implication to provide means for raising money therefor; Polk v. Douglas, 6 Yerg. 211, to effect that Federal government had exclusive authority to regulate process of Federal courts.

Jurisdiction of court over cause does not terminate with the judgment, but continues until its satisfaction.

Approved in D. B. Martin Co. v. Shannonhouse, 203 Fed. 519, holding that where money held in custody of clerk of Federal court under its judgment, it could not be attached under writ issued out of State court; Ferriday v. Cole, 12 Wis. 207, 209, holding process acts did not apply to Federal courts in Wisconsin, whose power to adopt rules conforming to State law regulating process, was given by act admitting Wisconsin to the Union.

Lien of judgments in Federal courts. Note, 24 Am. Dec. 312; 47 L. R. A. 471, 472.

Thirty-fourth section of judiciary act of 1789, making State laws rules of decision for Federal courts, has no application to practice or process.

Approved in Chicago etc. Ry. Co. v. Kendall, 167 Fed. 65, 16 Ann. Cas. 560, 93 C. C. A. 422, holding that where in action for damages plaintiff refused to submit to examination of injury, Federal court had power to compel submission independently of local statute; Importers' etc. Bank v. Lyons, 134 Fed. 512, under rule of Circuit Court for eastern district of Pennsylvania on rule to show cause, testimony may be taken by deposition; Dreyfus v. Barton, 98 Miss. 771, 54 South. 256, holding that where under State exemption laws policy of insurance was exempt, policy of bankrupt was exempt and proceeds went to his administrator; Ross v. Duval, 13 Pet. 60, 61, 10 L. Ed. 58, 59, holding State act of limitation on judgments within the rule; Wright v. Bales, 2 Black, 537, 17 L. Ed. 265, holding rules of evidence prescribed by State statute included; Diblee v. Furniss, 4 Blatchf. 262, Fed. Cas. 3888, holding section to include State law allowing party to testify as witness in his own behalf; Clark v. Sohier, 1 Wood. & M. 374, 375, Fed. Cas. 2835, holding State law permitting new trial within three years after judgment taken by default, through mistake of party, is within the section; Derby v. Jacques, 1 Cliff. 439, Fed. Cas. 3817, holding that though writ of right continued as process alone in Federal courts in Massachusetts after abolition by State law, it was barred by final judgment of State court in writ of entry; Sanford v. Portsmouth, 2 Flipp. 108, Fed. Cas. 12,315, holding Federal court not bound by State decision that mandamus is only remedy on municipal bonds; McLean v. County, 16 Fed. Cas. 249, holding that under statute board of county commissioners could sue or be sued in Federal as well as State court; Lane v. Townsend, 1 Ware, 288, Fed. Cas. 8054, holding law relating to taking of bail bond not within section as it related to mode of proceedings; United States v. Rathbone, 2 Paine, 583, Fed. Cas. 16,121, holding State law providing for references in certain cases inapplicable to Federal courts; Beck v. Burnett, 22 Ala. 825, holding State law of redemption being law relating to process is not within rule of section; United States v. Eckford, 6 Wall. 490, 18 L. Ed. 922, holding New York statute directing court where setoff exceeds amount sued for to give defendant judgment for excess, is not applicable to Federal courts, so as to permit defendant to recover by way of setoff against United States; Leitch v. The George Law, 15 Fed. Cas. 267, refusing to allow lien on vessel according to provisions of State law for sum due from master and owner under State law governing pilots; Railroad Co. v. Bank, 102 U. S. 53, 26 L. Ed. 75, to point that State laws respecting practice and process are inapplicable to Federal courts; Polk v. Douglas, 6 Yerg. 214, holding acts relating to process not within the section; In re Metzger, 17 Fed. Cas. 236, holding New York statute regulating procedure in extradition cases not applicable to Federal court; Thompson v. Phillips, 1 Bald. 275, Fed. Cas. 13,974, holding State law limiting lien of judgment to be rule of property and within section.

Distinguished in Blanchard v. Sprague, 1 Cliff. 290, Fed. Cas. 1516, holding State law making parties competent witnesses, not binding on Federal court in suit in equity; Goodyear v. Prov. Co., 2 Cliff. 369, Fed. Cas. 5583, holding doctrine had no application to equity; Austen v. Miller, 5 McLean, 156, Fed. Cas. 661, holding decision of State court that certain commercial paper was not a promissory note did not bind Federal court, as it was question of mercantile law; Lamson v. Mix, 14 Fed. Cas. 1056, holding rule did not extend to court of equity, but neglecting to expressly distinguish case.

Proviso in a statute is generally intended to restrain or modify the enacting clause.

Approved in In re Matthews, 109 Fed. 614, holding under mechanic's lien law, Ark. Acts 1895, p. 217, giving mechanics priority over other liens, except over prior liens given for raising funds to erect building, that money raised must actually be used in building; Wilkins v. United States, 96 Fed. 840, holding that defacement of revenue stamps, the designing of which Congress has left to the administrative branch of government, is criminal offense; San Francisco v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 251, 135 Pac. 974, where an act declared that certain taxes imposed upon telephone companies were in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, they were exempt from license fee under city ordinance; United States v. Macfarland, 18 App. D. C. 126, mandamus will not lie to compel issuance of deed unless proviso of act to effect that all taxes must have been paid is complied with; McDougal v. State, 183 Ind. 170, 108 N. E. 525, in prosecution for violation of statute containing proviso exempting licensed druggists, it was error to exclude evidence that accused was such druggist; Lichtensteiger v. State, 89 Neb. 359, 131 N. W. 624, holding that as package was labeled as required under proviso of act, selling of it by defendant was not penal offense; Marsh v. Nichols, 128 U. S. 616, 32 L. Ed. 542, 9 Sup. Ct. 172, holding an act of Congress not retroactive, by reason of proviso contained therein; United States v. Church, 36 Fed. 305, where minister of gospel not included in proviso to contract labor act, he comes within provisions of act; United States v. One Hundred and Thirty-two Packages, 65 Fed. 983, where United States Revised Statutes, section 3449, is construed with reference to act to which it was originally a proviso; Boston etc. Co. v. Hudson, 68 Fed. 760, 25 U. S. App. 257, confining effect of proviso to that act alone to which it is the proviso; Pearce v. Bank, 33 Ala. 702, limiting operation of proviso in act extending bank charter to time beginning with the date from which extended; Railway Co. v. Kennerly, 74 Ala. 590, refusing to construe proviso to act granting powers to corporation so as to enlarge powers granted by enacting clause; Ex parte Lusk, 82 Ala. 522, 2 South. 142, adopting that construction of section of State Constitution whereby proviso thereto becomes operative in restraining enacting clause in preference to one by which proviso would be superfluous; Wells F. & Co. v. Board, 56 Cal. 203, holding proviso to section of Constitution relating to boards of equalization modifies enacting clause; State v. County, 23 Fla. 486, 3 South. 194, restricting operation of proviso to section of Constitution to which it is attached; Commrs.

v. State, 24 Fla. 268, 4 South. 797, construing proviso as qualifying clause to section of Constitution to which it is attached; Dodd v. State, 18 Ind. 63, construing saving clause in statute as restricting and explaining what goes before; Church v. City, 36 Ind. 344, 10 Am. Rep. 40, applying rule in construing tax law; Rice v. Keokuk, 15 Iowa, 583, holding limitation of proviso contained in an amendatory section to city charter which repeals proviso in original section, is merely substituted for limitation of latter without altering meaning of enacting clause; State v. Stapp, 29 Iowa, 553, in argument of court that matters contained in proviso must be insisted on by defense; Corbin v. Beebee, 36 Iowa, 342, where proviso construed to take cases of the class mentioned therein out of restriction of enacting clause; Lodge v. Hocking, 60 N. J. L. 442, 64 Am. St. Rep. 598, 38 Atl. 694, holding proviso to section of by-laws to fraternal society could not operate to give powers not elsewhere given; Lanning v. Administrator, 17 N. J. Eq. 234, refusing to extend scope of proviso beyond that of the enacting clause, which it limited; Campbell v. Wiggins, 85 Tex. 428, 21 S. W. 601, construing proviso to exemption act as taking out of operation of enacting clause particular cases in proviso mentioned; Graves v. State, 6 Tex. App. 235, holding proviso limited the enacting clause and prevented holding of courts under the act until arrival of time prescribed by act for holding at place named in proviso; Commonwealth v. Ford, 29 Gratt. 688, holding proviso to exemption act limited its effect by withdrawing judgment debtor's property from its operation in the cases enumerated in the proviso; State v. Bellew, 86 Wis. 195, 56 N. W. 784, where there was an exception in a statute immediately followed by proviso, held, no contrary intention appearing, proviso restricted exception alone.

Distinguished in Carroll v. State, 58 Ala. 401, holding rule not applicable where clause in State Constitution, though preceded by word "provided," was not proviso as disclosed by language and context.

The words "suits at common law" include proceedings after judgment as well as those before.

Cited in Ex parte Towles, 48 Tex. 433, construing word "suits" in Texas Constitution.

The laws of Union may permit agency of State officers to administer Federal regulations.

Niles, 1 Ind. 204, applying State process laws as to judgment liens as they stood at date of process act of 1828, to Federal court; Howe v. Freeman, 14 Gray, 578, holding State process laws, subsequent to process act, had no application to processes of Federal court; Kennerly v. Shepley, 15 Mo. 650, 57 Am. Dec. 222, sustaining validity of United States marshal's execution sale, against objection that it did not conform to State law regulating execution sales, when made in Missouri before 1828, when the court had adopted no rules; Woodley v. Gilliam, 67 N. C. 239, holding sale by United States marshal under execution from Federal court, according to State practice, as it was in 1789, gave title to vendee, and subsequent sale by sheriff under State court execution issued after that from Federal court, void; Sellers v. Corwin, 5 Ohio, 406, 24 Am. Dec. 306, holding State execution laws adopted by rule of Federal court; Wood v. Funk, 7 Ohio, 197, holding discharge under Ohio insolvent law, in force when process act of 1828 adopted, operated to discharge prisoner under process from Federal court; Hepburn v. Kerr, 9 Humph. 729, 51 Am. Dec. 687, holding lands sold under process of Federal court after 1828, subject to State redemption law of 1820; Thompson v. Avery, 11 Utah, 233, 39 Pac. 835, holding judgments of Federal courts in the territory were liens on real estate when so by the laws of the territory; Van Hook v. Pendleton, 2 Blatchf. 88, Fed. Cas. 16,852, and Towne v. Smith, 1 Wood. & M. 132, Fed. Cas. 14,115, Bains v. Schooner, 1 Bald. 563, 564, Fed. Cas. 756, arguendo.

Distinguished in Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. 368, 372, 9 L. Ed. 160, 162, dissenting opinion, contending Federal courts could not adopt by rule State law arresting or restraining process; Yonley v. Lavender, 27 Ark. 262, holding litigant who obtained judgment in Federal courts against an administrator in his fiduciary capacity, could not proceed directly against estate, but was remitted to the State Probate Court for payment; Moore v. Allen, 7 J. J. Marsh. 657, holding act of 1800, conforming to State laws respecting imprisoned debtors, adopted future legislation of the States on the subject; Adler v. Cole, 12 Wis. 207, holding process acts did not apply to Federal courts in Wisconsin, whose power to adopt rules was given by act admitting Wisconsin to the Union; Hardemann v. Downer, 39 Ga. 428, in argument upon question of constitutionality of retroactive exemption law; Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 330, 12 L. Ed. 459, in argument upon constitutionality of retroactive exemption law; Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. 659, 8 L. Ed. 536, holding certain State law as to injunction was peculiar municipal regulation not adopted by process acts; Carroll v. Watkins, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 480, Fed. Cas. 2457, and United States v. Humphreys, 3 Hughes, 204, Fed. Cas. 15,422, holding State law requiring recording of judgments in order for them to become liens on real estate not applicable to judgment of Federal court, being peculiar municipal regulation requiring agency of State officer; Darst v. Duncan, 6 Fed. Cas. 1195, and Duncan v. Klinefelter, 5 Watts, 143, 30 Am. Dec. 297, holding State court judge had no authority to release debtor imprisoned under process from Federal court.

Modified in McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 17, 11 L. Ed. 162, holding process acts did not adopt State laws peculiarly applicable to State courts and officers, and, therefore, debtor imprisoned under process from Federal courts could not be discharged by State judge, under such law; Fordyce v. Beecher, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 21 S. W. 180, holding State law, by its terms peculiarly applicable to State courts, does not apply to receivers appointed by Federal courts.

Words "principles and usages of law," in fourteenth section of judiciary act, include local State laws, and do not restrict to common law.

Cited in Grantland v. Memphis, 12 Fed. 288, to point that Revised Statutes, section 716, permit the Federal courts to issue writs of scire facias, according to usages of State law; Adler v. Cole, 12 Wis. 211, arguing that attachment could be issued from Federal court in common-law action according to State laws.

Denied in dissenting opinion in Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 210, 8 L. Ed. 100, majority holding, power to issue mandamus granted to Supreme Court thereby.

Power conferred on United States courts to alter processes and modes of proceeding not delegation of legislative power.

Approved in Blair v. Ostrander, 109 Iowa, 206, 77 Am. St. Rep. 533, 80 N. W. 330, holding though Acts Iowa 1878, c. 129, § 2, requiring filing of Federal court judgments to make them liens was invalid when passed, it was made effectual by Acts Congress 1888, c. 729; dissenting opinion in Ex parte Francis, 72 Tex. Cr. 351, 165 S. W. 172, majority holding that where prohibitory statute was dependent on election, such fact did not make it unconstitutional; White v. Toledo etc. R. R. Co., 79 Fed. 135, 51 U. S. App. 59, upholding grant to Supreme Court of power to prescribe forms and modes of obtaining evidence; Ex parte Hill, 38 Ala. 451, holding Confederate Congress could delegate to its officers exclusive authority to decide upon eligibility for military service; dissenting opinion in Coleman v. Newby, 7 Kan. 88, arguing that legislature could not delegate to State Supreme Court authority to adopt rule prescribing method of appeal; Moore v. Allen, 7 J. J. Marsh. 655, dissenting opinion, to effect that adoption by act of Congress of 1800, of prospective State legislation on subject of prison bounds, not a delegation of legislative power; In re Griner, 16 Wis. 437, holding act of Congress giving President power to make rules and regulations for calling out militia not a delegation of legislative power; Ward v. Chamberlin, 29 Fed. Cas. 178, sustaining grant to Supreme Court by act of Congress of authority to regulate process of Federal courts.

Long, practical construction of statute should be given great weight by court construing it.

Approved in State v. Carter, 174 Ala. 279, 56 South. 979, holding in quo warranto proceedings against justice of peace, court should regard contemporaneous construction of Constitution; Hill v. Tohill, 225 Ill. 393, 8 Ann. Cas. 423, 80 N. E. 256, holding law held valid for fifty years constitutional; Higgins v. Brown, 1 Okl. Cr. 48, 94 Pac. 709, upholding sections 16 and 20 of enabling act with reference to transfer of causes; State v. Nashville Baseball Club, 127 Tenn. 304, Ann Cas. 1914B, 1243, 154 S. W. 1154, and Higgins v. Brown, 20 Okl. 371, 94 Pac. 709, both holding where particular construction of statute has been long acquiesced in and accepted as correct, presumption exists that such construction was correct; Talcott v. Pine Grove, 1 Flipp. 156, Fed. Cas. 13,735, construing statute authorizing bond issue in accordance with practical legislative and departmental action thereon; People v. Thompson, 155 Ill. 485, 40 N. E. 317, holding constitutional an apportionment of senatorial districts by legislature under this rule; Clark v. Mowyer, 5 Mich. 468, construing provision of tax laws in accordance with practical construction long given it by auditors general; McPherson v. Secretary of State, 92 Mich. 383, 31 Am. St. Rep. 591, 16 L. R. A. 478, 52 N. W. 471, sustaining law for electing presidential electors by districts, because contemporaneous construction of Federal Constitution permitted such a law; Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 576, upholding validity of an act of legislature on ground of contemporaneous practical construction of State Constitution permitting such legislation; Railway Co. v. Miller, 19 W. Va. 421, holding court should regard contemporaneous practical construction of Constitution in deciding upon constitutionality of law exempting a corporation from taxation under conditions; Railway Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 647, 48 N. W. 1009, holding constitutional statute giving authority to municipalities to permit construction of street railways.

Provision of judiciary act, adopting local law as rule of decision, does not apply to the local law of procedure.

Cited in United States v. Eckford, 6 Wall. 490, 18 L. Ed. 922, holding New York statute as to setoff does not apply to suit brought by government in Federal court; Beck v. Burnett, 22 Ala. 825, holding State redemption law not binding on Federal courts; Thompson v. Phillips, 1 Bald. 275, Fed. Cas. 13,974, holding State law limiting lien of judgment to be a rule of property, and adopted for Federal courts; In re Metzger, 17 Fed. Cas. 236, holding New York statute regulating procedure in extradition cases not applicable to Federal courts.

Jurisdiction of court over cause does not terminate with judgment, but continues until its satisfaction.

Approved in Leathe v. Thomas, 97 Fed. 139, holding under Rev. Stats., § 720, Federal court will not enjoin sheriff from proceeding under execution issued out of State court; United States v. Lesnet, 9 N. M. 275, 50 Pac. 322, holding under N. M. Laws 1891, p. 123, § 5, providing for appeals, an appeal does not lie from a judgment assigning to intervener, a homestead from lands sold on execution; dissenting opinion in State ex rel. v.

Smith, 158 Ind. 562, see 63 N. E. 25, 64 N. E. 18, majority holding provisions of Acts 1889, p. 422, § 1, providing for deductions on account of mortgage is not an exemption; Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. 194, 18 L. Ed. 776, holding Federal court might mandamus a county to levy taxes to satisfy Federal judgment; Darst v. Duncan, 6 Fed. Cas. 1198, holding proceedings in suit ended upon execution of final process and State court had no authority thereafter to release prisoner under State insolvent law; United States v. Drennen, Hempst. 325, Fed. Cas. 14,992, holding that United States having right to sue estates of decedents in Federal courts, court could proceed to execute judgment in its favor in spite of restrictions of State probate law; Ex parte Holman, 28 Iowa, 104, 106, 4 Am. Rep. 168, 169, holding Federal court could issue mandamus to compel tax levy to satisfy its judgment against a county, and State court could not interfere; Friedman v. Israel, 26 Fed. 805, holding that when case was rightfully removed from State to Federal court, latter had authority to order marshal to take property attached by former court, from sheriff; United States v. Lesnet (N. M.), 50 Pac. 322, holding judgment on an intervention to save a homestead from execution sale, merely supplemental to the action out of which execution grew.

The Supreme Court does not consider the constitutionality of law where not necessary for determination of case.

Cited in dissenting opinion in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 324, 11 L. Ed. 148, arguing that a State law prescribing procedure on sale of mortgaged premises under decree, never having been adopted by Federal court, was not before Supreme Court for construction; McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. 617, 11 L. Ed. 401, arguing constitutionality of State law regulating procedure on sales under execution, never adopted by Federal court, was not a question for the decision of the Supreme Court; dissenting opinion in Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 156, and Cook v. Gray, 2 Houst. 471, 81 Am. Dec. 189, refusing to regard certain decisions of Federal Supreme Court as authority upon question of constitutionality of law.

10 Wheat. 66, 6 L. Ed. 268, BANK OF UNITED STATES v. JANUARY.

Congress, by process acts of 1789 and 1792, adopted writ of ca. sa. in all States in which it was in use as State process.

Cited in Moore v. Allen, 3 J. J. Marsh. 617, holding ca. sa. could issue from United States courts in Kentucky after its abolition in Kentucky by act passed in 1821.

Slave trade is contrary to the law of nature.

Cited in Osborn v. Nicholson, 1 Dill. 224, Fed. Cas. 10,595, reversed in 13 Wall. 657, 20 L. Ed. 694, in argument, that no recovery can be had on promissory note given in Arkansas, before secession, for price of slave; dissenting opinion in McElvain v. Mudd, 44 Ala. 73, in argument against recovery on promissory note given in 1864, for price of slaves, and in favor of validity of ordinance of constitutional convention making slave contracts void; Commonwealth v. Ames, 18 Pick. 211, where court refused to return to her owner slave voluntarily brought into Massachusetts; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 564, in discussion sustaining bequests for benefit of fugitive slaves, and applying same to benefit of freedmen after abolition of slavery. See also Sims' Case, 7 Cush. 314, 315, note to decision.

Governments abolishing slave trade are bound to recognize its existence, and rights growing out of it, of citizens of countries where it is not prohibited.

Cited in Osborn v. Nicholson, 13 Wall. 657, 661, 20 L. Ed. 694, 695, holding recovery could be had upon promissory note given in Arkansas for purchase of slave before secession; Dole v. Insurance Co., 2 Cliff. 419, 421, Fed. Cas. 3966, applying principle by analogy in holding that destruction of American vessel by Confederate cruiser was not an act of piracy, under international law; Neal v. Farmer, 9 Ga. 569, holding fact of Great Britain having consented to legality of slave trade, did not make African slavery an English institution to which rules of common law were applicable; Commonwealth v. Aves, 18 Pick. 211, to effect that Massachusetts courts should respect rights of citizens of other States, growing out of legal existence of slavery therein, so far as they could be respected under Massachusetts law; Sims' Case, 7 Cush. 314, 315, to point that courts of State where slavery is not recognized, should recognize its legal existence in other States and respect the rights growing out of the institution in such States; King v. Sarria, 69 N. Y. 32, 24 Am. Rep. 133, where, in suit in New York against special partner in limited partnership in Cuba, the contract of partnership was construed according to Spanish law.

Denied in Osborn v. Nicholson, 1 Dill. 224, Fed. Cas. 10,595, overruled in 13 Wall. 657, 20 L. Ed. 694, in argument that no recovery can be had on note given before secession for price of clave; dissenting opinion in McElvain v. Mudd, 44 Ala. 73, in argument against recovery on promissory note, given in 1864, for purchase price of slaves.

The courts of one country cannot execute the penal laws of another.

Approved in Schick v. United States, 195 U. S. 76, 49 L. Ed. 105, 24 Sup. Ct. 826, State v. Warner, 197 Mo. 658, 94 S. W. 964, and Casey v. St. Louis Transit Co., 116 Mo. App. 268, 91 S. W. 431, all arguendo; Carey v. Schmeltz, 221 Mo. 136, 119 S. W. 947, holding that where action was based on penal statute of sister State, appellate court had no jurisdiction; Mohr v. Burden of proof is on claimant to slaves on board captured vessel, to show title in himself.

Cited in Gedney v. L'Amistad, 10 Fed. Cas. 148, 151, where negroes found on vessel seized off coast of Long Island, held entitled to be sent back to Africa, Spanish claimant having failed to prove title to them.

Distinguished in dissenting opinion in De Lacy v. Antoine, 7 Leigh, 449, arguing against release on habeas corpus of negroes claimed as slaves by Portuguese consul, who could show no evidence upon which he based his claim.

Supreme Court being equally divided in opinion, the decree of the lower court was affirmed.

Approved in Charlottesville etc. Ry. Co. v. Rubin, 107 Va. 752, 60 S. E. 101, right of divided court to affirm judgment of lower court rests not on statute but is rule of necessity; Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 424, 11 L. Ed. 663, holding affirmance of decree on former appeal, by divided court, precluded examination on subsequent appeal into question of jurisdiction on such former occasion; Durant v. Essex Co., 7 Wall. 112, 19 L. Ed. 157, holding conclusive and binding upon the parties an affirmance by divided court, of decree of lower court; Ayres v. Bensley, 32 Cal. 633, holding equal division of State Supreme Court upon motion for rehearing was denial of motion; Kolb v. Swann, 68 Md. 521, 13 Atl. 380, holding judgment of affirmance by equally divided court as final and conclusive as if court were unanimous; Goddard v. Coffin, 2 Ware, 385, Fed. Cas. 5490, to effect that where Circuit Court divided in opinion on motion for judgment, no affirmative order can be made.

It is sufficient to incur forfeiture of vessel under slave trade acts if any preparations for illegal voyage are made.

Cited in United States v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. 473, 6 L. Ed. 697, holding it not to be necessary for conviction that vessel should be completely equipped in an American port, provided guilty intent accompanied the act; The Slavers, 2 Wall. 380, 17 L. Ed. 910, holding fact that cargo and equipment might have been intended for legal object not available for defense where there was evidence of guilty intent; The Wanderer, 1 Sprague, 519, Fed. Cas. 17,139, where held that circumstance that fitment was incomplete and no part of it exclusively adapted to slave trade would not prevent forfeiture where guilty intent present; Charge to Grand Jury, 30 Fed. Cas. 1027, to effect that forfeiture attaches as soon as any preparation begun with intent to use vessel in slave trade.

Miscellaneous. Cited in The Schooner Tilton, 5 Mason, 471, Fed. Cas. 14,054, as instance of case where court inquired into true title to vessel.

Ed. 608, holding bill of review filed before time for appeal passed was filed in time; Trust Co. v. Works, 135 U. S. 227, 34 L. Ed. 105, 10 Sup. Ct. 742, affirming order striking bills of review from the files because not filed until after expiration of time within which to appeal; Taylor v. Insurance Co., 3 McCrary, 486, 17 Fed. 567, where bill of review dismissed because not filed until after time within which writ of error could have been brought; Massie v. Graham, 3 McLean, 52, Fed. Cas. 9263, where leave to file bill denied on ground that due diligence in discovery of new matter not shown, and more than thirty years had elapsed since decree; Baker v.

Biddle, 1 Bald. 419, Fed. Cas. 764, holding bill for account barred by former account and running of period more than equal to statute of limitations; Dunlevy v. Dunlevy, 38 Fed. 462, dismissing bill of review based upon errors on face of the record because not filed until six years after decree entered; McDonald v. Whitney, 39 Fed. 467, and Reed v. Stanley, 89 Fed. 433, 437, dismissing bill of review based upon errors on face of record because petition not filed within time limited for appeal on writ of error; Rector v. Fitzgerald, 59 Fed. 813, 19 U. S. App. 423, holding bill of review could not be allowed after expiration of time limited for taking appeal; Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 321, dismissing complaint in nature of bill of review for new trial, on ground of newly discovered evidence, because not filed within time limited for appeal; Fillyau v. Laverty, 3 Fla. 108, where statute limiting time within which to present demands against decedent's estate, applied by analogy to creditor of partnership to which deceased belonged, filing bill in equity to recover partnership debt from deceased's estate; Guerry v. Durham, 11 Ga. 17, holding bill of review could be filed within twenty years, but not after; Coombs v. Jordan, 3 Bland Ch. 327, 22 Am. Dec. 274, holding statute limiting time within which execution could issue on a judgment at law, would be applied by analogy to decrees in equity; York's Appeal, 110 Pa. St. 82, 2 Atl. 69, where creditor of estate presented claim in Orphans' Court, it was held to be barred by statute of limitations because it would have been so barred in law court; Fenwick v. Macey, 1 Dana (Ky.), 292, holding statute of limitations applies to bar equity of redemption of slaves which had been in adverse possession of original mortgagee more than five years; Morgan v. Railroad Co., 39 W. Va. 28, 19 S. E. 592, applying ten days' limitation within which to appeal, by analogy to application for writ of certiorari; Poole v. Nixon, 19 Fed. Cas. 1000, where possibility of loss of opportunity to file bill of review by expiration of time given as reason for allowing amendment of record pending appeal; United States v. Rico, 27 Fed. Cas. 809, holding District Court had no jurisdiction to entertain bill of review where United States were guilty of laches.

Modified in Ensminger v. Powers, 108 U. S. 302, 27 L. Ed. 736, 2 Sup. Ct. 651, holding bill of review filed in time, though not within two years after final decree, because while appeal was pending in Supreme Court the control of Circuit Court over decree was suspended; United States v. Samperyac, Hempst. 131, Fed. Cas. 16,216a, holding rule not applicable where bill of review based on newly discovered evidence; Jenkins v. Prewitt, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 9, holding when bill of review based on newly discovered evidence, time runs from date of discovery; Boyd v. Vanderkemp, 1 Barb. Ch. 288, denying application for leave to answer decree which had been taken as confessed nine years before, and upon which decree had been entered five years before; Hyde v. Lamberson, 1 Idaho, 542, holding advantage could not be taken, on demurrer, of failure to file bill of review in time.

Distinguished in Perkins v. Cartmell, 4 Harr. 274, 275, 42 Am. Dec. 755, 756, where held since legacies were not within statute of limitations respecting actions and entries concerning lands, the exceptions thereto were not applicable in equity to demand for payment of legacy, but the same was barred for staleness.

Limitations in equity. Note, 12 Am. Dec. 372.

Time within which bill of review must be brought. Note, 6 Ann. Cas. 330, 332.

Leave to file bill of review on ground of newly discovered evidence rests in the sound discretion of the court.

Approved in Hopkins v. Hebard, 194 Fed. 309, 114 C. C. A. 261, affirmed in Hopkins v. Hebard, 235 U. S. 291, 59 L. Ed. 234, 35 Sup. Ct. 26, holding that as new evidence may result in mischief to innocent parties, review asked for should be denied; Acord v. Western Pocahontas Corporation, 156 Fed. 995, holding that no sufficient excuse showing for failure to present newly discovered evidence at trial, bill should not be filed; Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 314, Fed. Cas. 13,259, discussing circumstances under which leave should be given by court, but dismissing bill on merits; Massie v. Graham, 3 McLean, 52, Fed. Cas. 9263, where court in exercise of its discretion, denied leave to file bill; Elliott v. Balcom, 11 Gray, 300, since leave to file bill of review not founded on errors in record lies in discretion of the court, findings on petition to file same are not conclusive nor evidence of facts set out in bill; Maddox v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 617, where court dismissed bill in exercise of its sound discretion.

10 Wheat. 181–192, 6 L. Ed. 297, CARNEAL v. BANKS.

Jurisdiction of Federal court in equity as between parties over whom Federal court has jurisdiction will not be ousted by joinder of those over whom it has not, if unnecessary.

Approved in Regis v. United Drug Co., 180 Fed. 206, holding that as bill showed no controversy wholly between residents of different States, motion to remand to State court should be granted; North Carolina Mining Co. v. Westfeldt, 151 Fed. 296, holding that where one of defendants was not indispensable, suit as to him could be dismissed; Grove v. Grove, 93 Fed. 867, holding court has power to retain jurisdiction of suit by dismissing parties not indispensable, but whose presence would deprive court of jurisdiction; Hatch v. Railroad Co., 6 Blatchf. 116, Fed. Cas. 6204, holding plaintiff could not deprive defendant of right of removal to Federal court by joining merely formal parties; Heriot v. Davis, 2 Wood. & M. 232, Fed. Cas. 6404, where court took jurisdiction as between plaintiff and defendant whose interest was distinct from that of certain nominal defendants, citizens of same State with plaintiff; Bowman v. Wathen, 2 McLean, 379, Fed. Cas. 1740, if certain plaintiffs were improperly joined court could proceed as between parties properly before it; Harrison v. Urann, 1 Story, 66, Fed. Cas. 6146, overruling plea by two defendants that third defendant who did not appear was citizen of same State with plaintiff; Pond v. Sibley, 19 Blatchf. 197, 7 Fed. 135, holding citizenship of officers of defendant corporations could not affect right of removal to Federal court, such officers being merely formal parties; Insurance Co. v. Svendsen, 74 Fed. 348, holding complainant could amend by omitting a merely nominal party defendant over whom court had no jurisdiction; Tug R. Co. v. Brige, 86 Fed. 820, holding complainant could amend by dropping citizen defendants where decree could be rendered as between the parties remaining; Gordon v. Simonton, 10 Fla. 196, where court held its jurisdiction was not affected as to parties properly before it, by joinder of a foreign executor who could not defend under State law; Howard v. Cannon, 11 Rich. Eq. 26, 75 Am. Dec. 739, to effect that Circuit Court could not have taken jurisdiction where some of the necessary parties defendant were citizens of the same State with plaintiff; Shields v. Barrows, 17 How. 140, 15 L. Ed. 161, directing dismissal where parties to a compromise, residing in same State with plaintiff, were indispensable parties to bill to rescind; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 508, 15 L. Ed. 200, to point that where party necessary for a decree not joined, court should refuse to act; Smith v. Rines, 2 Sumn. 350, Fed. Cas. 13,100, remanding to State court suit for damages arising out of tort, because defendants, some of whom were citizens of same State with plaintiff, were jointly liable; Conolly v. Wells, 33 Fed. 208, holding nonresident coexecutor to be such indispensable party to bill against executors for accounting, that court could not proceed without him.

Decree must be sustained by the allegations of the parties and proofs in the cause.

Approved in Columbia Digger Co. v. Rector, 215 Fed. 624, holding that where complaint did not sufficiently allege citizenship of certain parties, complainant could dismiss as to them; Edison Electric Light Co. v. Peninsular Light, Power & Heat Co., 95 Fed. 676, holding license to use electric invention showing it to be more restricted than shown by allegations of bill did not enlarge issue made by the pleadings or change their construction; dissenting opinion in Harrison v. Nixon, 9 Pet. 512, 9 L. Ed. 212, holding failure to prove allegations in the bill a proper subject for inquiry in appellate court; Tilghman v. Tilghman, Bald. 491, Fed. Cas. 14,045, holding plaintiff alleging written contract could not recover on proof of verbal one; Phelps v. Elliot, 35 Fed. 461, dismissing bill because, though facts proved establishing complainant's title, such facts were not alleged in the bill; Morgan v. Crabb, 3 Port. (Ala.) 473, holding defendant entitled to no benefit from proof of fact not alleged in his answer; Clements v. Kellogg, 1 Ala. 333, reversing decree for variance between allegations and proof; Graham v. Tankersley, 15 Ala. 647, holding chancellor properly refused decree upon proof not responsive to any of the allegations of the pleadings; Ansley v. Robinson, 16 Ala. 798, holding that decree could not embrace matters not alleged in the bill even though admitted by defendant; Nolley v. Rogers, 22 Ark. 229, reversing decree, because facts upon which rendered not distinctly alleged in the bill; West v. McCarty, 4 Blackf. 246, where decree reversed because not sustained by the allegations or the proof; Buck v. McCaughtry, 5 T. B. Mon. 221, holding evidence of facts not alleged in the bill inadmissible; dissenting opinion in Bayne v. State, 62 Md. 115, arguing that it was necessary for plaintiff to allege and prove fraud in grantee in order to support decree setting aside deed claimed to be in fraud of creditors; Warren Glass Works Co. v. Coal Co., 65 Md. 549, 5 Atl. 254, affirming judgment for defendant for failure of evidence to support averments of declaration; Bedford v. Williams, 5 Cold. 207, holding matters appearing in the proof alone and not otherwise in the record could not constitute ground for reversal; Keene v. Wheatley, 14 Fed. Cas. 188, holding matters not alleged in bill could not constitute basis for decree in favor of complainant.

Ct. 462, holding decree of District Court in admiralty could not be attacked collaterally on application for writ of prohibition; Evers v. Watson, 156 U. S. 533, 39 L. Ed. 523, 15 Sup. Ct. 432, where held decree of Circuit Court could not be attacked in collateral proceedings in same court for want of jurisdiction; Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 339, 38 L. Ed. 467, 14 Sup. Ct. 616, holding unreversed decree of Circuit Court binding upon parties, and could not be treated as a nullity by State court because jurisdiction had not appeared; Cutler v. Huston, 158 U. S. 430, 39 L. Ed. 1042, 15 Sup. Ct. 871, holding judgment of Circuit Court could not be treated as void in collateral proceeding on ground that diverse citizenship of parties had not appeared; In re Lennon, 166 U. S. 553, 41 L. Ed. 1112, 17 Sup. Ct. 660, where diverse citizenship of plaintiff and defendants appeared on the record in Circuit Court, contrary not permitted to be shown and judgment assailed therefor on petition for habeas corpus; Brown v. Noyes, 2 Wood. & M. 80, Fed. Cas. 2023, holding Federal court could not treat its own final judgment as nullity, nor vacate same on motion, for failure of record to show jurisdiction; Speigel v. Meredith, 4 Biss. 127, Fed. Cas. 13,227, holding allegation in a bill to quiet title of ignorance of citizenship of certain defendants, such defect as would defeat jurisdiction and render any decree thereon liable to reversal; Fideliter v. United States, 1 Sawy. 156, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 579, Fed. Cas. 4755, holding allegation of seizure, in libel to condemn vessel, necessary to jurisdiction, and failure to allege same ground for reversal on appeal; Farmers' etc. Co. v. McKinney, 6 McLean, 10, Fed. Cas. 4667, when Circuit Court refused to regard its decree in former case nullity because jurisdiction did not appear therein; Holmes v. Railroad Co., 7 Sawy. 392, 9 Fed. 237, denying Federal jurisdiction of cause of action already finally determined in proceeding in State court, deciding the question of inhabitancy of parties; In re Eaton, 51 Fed. 805, holding in collateral proceeding on application for habeas corpus order of injunction not void for failure of record to show jurisdictional facts; Skirving v. Insurance Co., 59 Fed. 745, 19 U. S. App. 442, refusing to enjoin execution of judgment obtained in Circuit Court for failure of record to show jurisdiction; Foltz v. Railway Co., 60 Fed. 318, 19 U. S. App. 576, holding jurisdiction of Federal court to condemn land in a suit in which final judgment rendered, not subject to collateral attack in proceeding between same parties to enjoin ejectment; Ex parte Lennon, 64 Fed. 322, 22 U. S. App. 561, holding jurisdiction of court to grant injunction in former proceeding, unassailable for lack of diverse citizenship of parties on petition for habeas corpus by one committed for contempt for violating injunction; Pullman Co. v. Washburn, 66 Fed. 794, holding defendant in suit to collect judgment rendered by Circuit Court could not assail jurisdiction of former suit for inadequacy of amount in controversy; Board v. Platt, 79 Fed. 571, 49 U. S. App. 216, 222, holding judgment of State court having jurisdiction of parties and subject matter not liable to collateral attack, in Federal court, for fraud or error; Dexter Co. v. Sayward, 84 Fed. 303, denying right of court in a collateral proceeding to pronounce void a judgment of Circuit Court and mandate of Supreme Court in cause removed from State court, though record fails to show ground for removal; Ludington v. The Nucleus, 15 Fed. Cas. 1095, holding District Court being of limited jurisdiction had no jurisdiction of contract for furnishing materials at home port on lake in building vessel, in absence of statute conferring same; In re McDonald, 16 Fed. Cas. 28, to point that jurisdiction of Federal court after judgment had been rendered could not be questioned for failure of record to show jurisdictional facts, in collateral proceeding on habeas corpus; Wyman v. Campbell, 6 Port. 244, 31 Am. Dec. 691, to effect that judgment of Orphans' Court of Alabama void unless jurisdictional facts appeared of record, it being a court of special jurisdiction; Nugent v. State, 18 Ala. 524, defining

"inferior courts" according to Alabama Constitution; Pearce v. Iron Works, 32 Ala. 72, holding Federal court judgment not subject to collateral attack on ground of want of diverse citizenship of parties; Busteed v. Parsons, 54 Ala. 401, 25 Am. Rep. 693, holding District Court though of limited is not of inferior jurisdiction, and judge thereof not liable personally for erroneously issuing warrant for arrest upon affidavit; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 426, where court held sentence of probate court to be conclusive except in a direct proceeding for its vacation or reversal; Borden v. State, 11 Ark. 541, 54 Am. Dec. 232, holding that Arkansas Probate Court being court of superior jurisdiction its decree could not be pronounced a nullity; La Croix v. Commissioners, 49 Conn. 596, defining "inferior courts" in State Constitution; Kenny v. Greer, 13 Ill. 452, arguing in favor of validity of State court judgment in collateral action, though jurisdictional facts did not appear; dissenting opinion in Haywood v. Collins, 60 Ill. 342, arguing against liability of judgment of State court of superior jurisdiction to collateral attack for want of jurisdiction; Hays v. Ford, 55 Ind. 56, holding complaint to enjoin collection of judgment because of plaintiff's discharge in bankruptcy, not demurrable for failure to show jurisdiction to grant discharge; Wright v. Marsh, 2 G. Greene, 103, holding judgment of a territorial court not void for failure of the record to show all jurisdictional facts; Ward v. Cozzens, 3 Mich. 258, in suit for false imprisonment, holding order of Federal court directing issue of capias not void, though facts did not authorize it; Grand etc. Co. v. Gray, 38 Mich. 468, defining jurisdiction of municipal courts, holding their judgments binding until reversed, though no jurisdiction be shown of record; Jim v. State, 3 Mo. 163, discussing effect in appellate court of omission of jurisdictional facts from record in murder trial; Reed v. Vaughn, 10 Mo. 448, where held bill to enjoin judgment included in bankrupt's schedule need not show jurisdiction of District Court to grant the discharge; Johnson v. Beazley, 65 Mo. 260, 27 Am. Rep. 282, holding record of appointment of administrator could not be regarded as a nullity in a collateral proceeding because record failed to show jurisdictional facts; State v. Rainey, 74 Mo. 234, to point that judgment of Federal court not subject to collateral attack in State court; Kittredge v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 263, to point that Federal court could not, in collateral proceeding, regard judgment of State court as void, though same might be reversible for error in Federal Supreme Court; Sherman v. Hanno, 66 N. H. 166, 28 Atl. 21, holding reference in mortgage to a deed for description of premises not ground for collateral attack on judgment of foreclosure; Russel v. Works, 35 N. J. L. 320, holding judgment of Justices' Court in New Jersey not to be liable to attack collaterally; Ruckman v. Cowell, 1 N. Y. 507, and Chemung v. Judson, 8 N. Y. 261, holding discharge in bankruptcy where offered in evidence, cannot be regarded as nullity for failure to show jurisdictional facts; Lessee v. Jeffries, 12 Ohio, 271, 40 Am. Dec. 478, to point, that mere failure to show jurisdiction on record in a collateral proceeding does not invalidate judgment of court of general jurisdiction; Sheldon v. Newton, 3 Ohio St. 500, to effect that proceedings of Court of Common Pleas not to be regarded as invalid in collateral proceeding for mere failure to show all jurisdictional facts; Thompson v. Lyle, 3 Watts & S. 168, holding it error for State court in collateral proceeding to regard proceedings of District Court as void; Supervisors v. Le Clerc, 3 Pinn. 327, holding that as County Courts were limited in their jurisdiction, the record must show that they acted within their powers; Williamson's Case, 26 Pa. St. 23, 67 Am. Dec. 386, holding State Supreme Court could not review judgment of District Court on application for habeas corpus; Vincent v. Davidson, 1 Kan. App. 612, 42 Pac. 392, holding judgment of an inferior court could not be questioned or set aside in a collateral proceeding where record showed jurisdiction; dissenting opinion in McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 22, 25, 11 L. Ed. 164, 165, arguing as to Federal jurisdiction for diverse citizenship.

Modified in Kingsbury v. Buckner, 134 U. S. 675, 33 L. Ed. 1057, 10 Sup. Ct. 646, holding that judgment is void and may be collaterally attacked where party against whom rendered was never before the court; Werz v. Werz, 11 Mo. App. 35, holding that the presumption in favor of judgments of superior courts is confined to proceedings according to course of common law; Morse v. Presby, 25 N. H. 301, to effect that decree of District Court in bankruptcy was liable to collateral attack, its powers in such cases being special; In re Booth, 3 Wis. 180, holding judgment of District Court void where record affirmatively showed it to have acted without jurisdiction.

Effect of inadvertent assumption of jurisdiction by appellate court. Note, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 70.

The inferior courts of the United States are courts of limited jurisdiction.

Approved in In re Columbia Real Estate Co., 101 Fed. 970, holding in bankruptcy proceedings in District Court, all facts necessary to give court jurisdiction need not appear on face of record; United States v. Ta-wanga-ca, Hempst. 305, Fed. Cas. 16,435, applying the rule in holding District Court for Arkansas could not take cognizance of crime committed outside of the district; United States v. New Bedford Bridge, 1 Wood. & M. 438, Fed. Cas. 15,867, denying Circuit Court's power to punish a nuisance in maintaining bridge over navigable waters, in absence of authority from Congress.

Law of place where land is situated governs as to the title and disposition of real property.

Approved in Coney Island v. McIntyre-Paxton Co., 200 Fed. 906, 119 C. C. A. 197, holding that although contract was not deed, mortgage or lease under laws of Ohio, it was contract and valid; Southern Pac. Co. v. Western Pac. Ry. Miscellaneous. Cited in The Paquete Habana, 189 U. S. 465, 47 L. Ed. 904, 23 Sup. Ct. 594, holding decree may be entered against United States by prize court, for damages resulting from capture of vessel by navy; Kelly v. Moore, 22 App. D. C. 25, to point that when any of witnesses to will has died, proof of his signature is sufficient prima facie proof of attestation of will by him; Warner v. Brinton, 29 Fed. Cas. 234, to point that probate of a will is not evidence of a devise at common law, and holding will could be contested after probate; p. 235, to point that minutes of evidence taken on probate probably open to objection in action of ejectment; Crapster v. Griffith, 2 Bland Ch. 24. Cited erroneously in Wilson v. Pierce, 30 Fed. Cas. 153.

10 Wheat. 204–245, 6 L. Ed. 303, WRIGHT v. DENN.

Devisee takes an estate for life only, where there are no words of limitation to the devise, and no contrary intention plainly appears.

Approved in McCaffrey v. Manogue, 196 U. S. 569, 49 L. Ed. 602, 25 Sup. Ct. 319, where testator disposes of whole estate to heirs as devisees equally, they take fee in lands; Atkins v. Best, 27 App. D. C. 153, where testator devised certain land without words of limitation to person, and then another piece of land "for life" to same person, construction was that first devise passed fee; McCaffrey v. Manogue, 22 App. D. C. 390, devise of land without words of limitation coupled with personal charge thereon passed it in fee simple; Ferguson v. Zepp, 4 Wash. C. C. 648, Fed. Cas. 4742, to point that introductory clause cannot per se enlarge the estate devised, to a fee; s. c., p. 649, Fed. Cas. 4742, holding that words "residue and remainder" in devising clause could not of themselves so enlarge estate; s. c., pp. 649, 650, Fed. Cas. 4742, to effect that where there is charge upon devisee personally in respect to devise, he takes fee; Warner v. Brinton, 29 Fed. Cas. 242, where court refused to construe introductory clause as enlarging the estate devised to a fee; dissenting opinion in Hitch v. Patten, 8 Houst. (Del.) 370, 371, 2 L. R. A. 734, 16 Atl. 577, to point that introductory clause cannot operate to enlarge the estate devised; McLean v. Turner, 15 Me. 438, holding a devise could not be construed to carry the fee because of a charge upon the realty for payment of debts; Lummus v. Mitchell, 34 N. H. 46, collecting cases, reaffirming general rule, but holding context plainly established intention to devise the fee; s. c., p. 47, holding charge of a legacy upon devisee with respect to land devised was a manifestation of intent to devise the fee; Steele v. Thompson, 14 Serg. & R. 94, holding in a case where the arrangement and connection indicated such an intention, the introductory clause had the effect of enlarging the estate devised to a fee.

Distinguished in Kellogg v. Blair, 6 Met. 326, holding that the word "estate" carried the fee.

Introductory clause of will as aid to construction. Note, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 344.

What word is necessary to carry estate in fee by will. Note, 10 E. R. C. 689.

Legacy is not charge upon real estate devised unless intention to charge is manifested by express words or by fair implication.

Approved in Lacey v. Collins, 134 Iowa, 585, 112 N. W. 102, holding that land was chargeable with payment of legacy; Morey v. Morey, 113 Iowa, 156, 84 N. W. 1040, holding where testator's will provided that all personal property should go to his wife and she was given a life estate in his realty but a remainder was devised to his nephews and he died intestate as to remainder, a specific cash legacy became a charge on remainder and not on specific devise to nephews; Taylor v. Harwell, 65 Ala. 10, holding legacy payable upon legatee's coming of age, out of profits upon realty devised in trust, not charge upon the realty if profits insufficient; In re Will of Newcomb, 98 Iowa, 179, 67 N. W. 588, holding legacy payable out of personalty only unless expressly or by necessary implication charged on realty; Owens v. Claytor, 56 Md. 133, where an annuity held not to be chargeable on real estate; Knotts v. Bailey, 54 Miss. 239, 28 Am. Rep. 351, where testator blended realty and personalty in residuary clause, held manifestation of intent to charge legacies on realty; Judge v. Kimball, 12 N. H. 170, holding legatee not entitled to proceed against land where legacy not charged thereon, except under New Hampshire statute, after personalty is exhausted; Leigh v. Savidge, 14 N. J. Eq. 129, to point that an express grant of power to executors to execute their trust does not charge realty with legacies; Larkin v. Larkin, 17 R. I. 463, 23 Atl. 20, holding annuities personally charged upon devisees of realty not chargeable upon the land; Kirkpatrick v. Chestnut, 5 S. C. 219, holding a charge to testator's sons to pay, as they become entitled to the estates devised to them, each an equal proportion of a sum to their sisters, not a charge on the land; Moore v. Davidson, 22 S. C. 101, where intention to charge realty appeared by clear implication from the terms of the will; Cairns v. Smith, 49 S. W. 732 (Tex. Civ.), holding general legacies not charged on realty.

Denied in Clyde v. Simpson, 4 Ohio St. 461, holding where legacy charged upon devisee in respect of the property devised, it is equitable charge upon land.

Devise or bequest by implication. Note, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 76.

Court should give effect to all words of will interpreted according to their plain and ordinary sense, unless manifestly otherwise applied.

Approved in Travers v. Reinhardt, 205 U. S. 431, 51 L. Ed. 869, 27 Sup. Ct. 563, holding that relationship established by proof showed that parties were husband and wife in State of their residence and will must be so construed that wife took under it; Estate of Wood, 36 Cal. 81, construing word "intestate" as used in the will; Welsch v. Bank, 94 Ill. 200, where court held the plain intention of testator to be the paramount object in construing wills, which would be effectuated by adding words, if plainly necessary; Matter of Tompkins, 154 N. Y. 645, 49 N. E. 138, applying rule construing will so as to give effect to all parts thereof; Steele v. Thompson, 14 Serg. & R. 101, where court considered all the circumstances apparent in the will in determining the intent of testator to devise the fee; Warner v. Brinton, 29 Fed. Cas. 237, upon value of settled rules of interpretation.

10 Wheat. 246–305, 6 L. Ed. 314, UNITED STATES v. MORRIS.

Remission of forfeiture by Secretary of Treasury.

Approved in Marvin v. Trout, 199 U. S. 225, 50 L. Ed. 162, 26 Sup. Ct. 31, upholding Ohio Rev. Stats., § 4275, authorizing action to subject building knowingly permitted to be used for gambling purposes to payment of judgment obtained by informer for recovery of money lost by play; United States v. One Hundred Fifty and Seven-twelfths Dozen Long Gloves, 168 Fed. 1012, holding that, although claimant did not appear in the forfeiture proceeding, he was not barred from applying for remission; Walker v. Globe Newspaper Co., 140 Fed. 309, Rev. Stats., §§ 4965, 4970, do not take away right of owner of copyrighted map to recover damages for infringement; Peacock v. United States, 125 Fed. 588, holding under Rev. Stats., § 5292, relating to remission of duties, the Secretary of Treasury has power to remit penalty before or after judgment; McLane v. United States, 6 Pet. 426, 8 L. Ed. 451, holding that where payment of an amount equal to certain duties, required as condition of remission, collector was entitled to his proportion of such sum; Maryland v. Railroad Co., 3 How. 552, 11 L. Ed. 722, sustaining right of State legislature to remit a forfeiture which, if not remitted, would have been payable under a previous act to a particular county; dissenting opinion in State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 408, 14 L. Ed. 993, arguing in favor of right of legislature to change the method of taxing the State bank from that provided in the act incorporating it; Dorsheimer v. United States, 7 Wall. 174, 19 L. Ed. 189, sustaining authority of Secretary of Treasury to remit forfeiture accruing under the revenue laws; Confiscation Cases, 7 Wall. 461, 462, 19 L. Ed. 199, sustaining authority of attorney general to move to dismiss prosecutions under act subjecting to forfeiture, property used to aid rebellion, notwithstanding the interest of the informant; The Laura, 114 U. S. 415, 29 L. Ed. 148, 5 Sup. Ct. 883, holding remission of penalties by Secretary of Treasury, under Revised Statutes, section 5294, where applied for before determination by competent court, of informer's interest, destroys all liability; The Laura, 19 Blatchf. 566, 569, 8 Fed. 615, 617, sustaining power of Secretary of Treasury to remit penalty under Revised Statutes, section 5294, thereby extinguishing all liability; United States v. Three Parcels, 3 Ware, 76, Fed. Cas. 16,512, holding collector improperly joined as coplaintiff in information in rem for forfeiture, his interest being conditional and liable to extinction by remission; About Twenty-five Thousand Gallons, 1 Ben. 372, Fed. Cas. 14,282, sustaining right of United States to consent to reopening of case after decree, and thereby to affect reformer's rights in forfeited goods; Princess of Orange, Jewels of, 19 Fed. Cas. 1337, in argument upon right of collector to show cause against remission of forfeiture; The Palo Alto, 2 Ware (Dav.), 354, 355, Fed. Cas. 10,700, to point that the remission is not irrevocable until delivery of the rem, where unconditional; Matter of Flournoy, 1 Ga. 609, holding remission of a fine by the Governor, extinguished liability on a note which had been given for the payment thereof; Thompson v. Bassett, 5 Ind. 536, holding no recovery could be had on penal bond after repeal of the act giving the penalty; Lapham v. Almy, 13 Allen, 305, holding informer had no recovery against collector of port for share of sum paid by way of compromise of legal proceedings for smuggling; Rice v. Thayer, 105 Mass. 261, 7 Am. Rep. 519, holding informer entitled to nothing paid by way of compromise before final judgment; University v. Rowse, 42 Mo. 323, sustaining authority of legislature to repeal clause of charter exempting university from taxation; Burroughs v. Peyton, Abrahams v. Same, 16 Gratt. 492, sustaining power of Confederate Congress, to deprive citizens of exemption from military service formerly granted in consideration of their furnishing substitutes; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 601, 40 L. Ed. 822, 16 Sup. Ct. 648, discussing President's pardoning power.

Distinguished in United States v. Griswold, 11 Sawy. 72, 24 Fed. 365, denying right of government to compromise a qui tam action without the consent, and to the detriment of the prosecutor; United States v. Harris, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 117, Fed. Cas. 15,312, holding President could not, by pardon after judgment, divest informer of his vested right in the forfeited property; Cook v. Freeholders, 26 N. J. L. 335, holding that a pardon after payment of a fine does not entitle person pardoned to restitution of the fine already paid.

A defective plea may, in some cases, be aided by the replication.

Approved in Vickery v. New London Northern R. Co., 87 Conn. 642, 89 Atl. 280, Nashville etc. Ry. v. Anderson, 134 Tenn. 678, 185 S. W. 680, and Texas etc. R. Co. v. Miller, 221 U. S. 416, 55 L. Ed. 796, 31 Sup. Ct. 534, all holding that defect in pleading was cured by answer; Childress v. Foster, 3 Ark. 258, where certain defects held waived by pleading over; Railway Co. v. Hessions, 150 Ill. 558, 37 N. E. 908, where allegation necessary to state a cause of action was stated only in last count, upon defendant's pleading over, it was held applicable to each count; Ellis v. Appleby, 4 R. I. 468, holding omission of essential allegation from a plea was cured by admission of the necessary fact in the replication; McMahon v. Polk, 10 S. D. 300, 73 N. W. 78, collecting cases, holding omission of essential fact from complaint cured by its averment in the answer.

Distinguished in Frazer v. Roberts, 32 Mo. 461, holding defect in petition not cured by admission of omitted fact in answer of one only of two defendants answering separately.

Custom-house officers have inchoate interest upon seizure of goods subject to forfeiture vested by distribution of proceeds.

Cited in United States v. Collier, 3 Blatchf. 346, Fed. Cas. 14,833, where held that after formal distribution under decree, the collector could not be divested of his distributive share by remission of forfeiture; United States v. Sixty-four Barrels, 3 Cliff. 317, Fed. Cas. 16,306, to effect that in proceedings to condemn spirits for payment of tax out of proceeds, condemnation relates back no further than date of seizure; In re Jayne, 28 Fed. 422, to effect that under law existing before 1874, informer had a vested right in penalty after payment into treasury; Cushman v. Hale, 68 Vt. 449, 458, 35 Atl. 384, 387, holding prosecuting attorney had acquired, by conviction, only inchoate conditional expectancy, which was extinguished pending appeal, by repeal of law giving him share of fine.

The term "prosecution" embraces everything up to and including the execution.

Approved in United States v. Carlisle, 5 App. D. C. 146, holding that repeal of act relating to bounty for sugar producers, took away all claims existing under original act.

Fines, penalties and disabilities are not incurred, and do not accrue, until judgment.

Approved in United States v. Heinszen, 206 U. S. 388, 11 Ann. Cas. 688, 51 L. Ed. 1104, 27 Sup. Ct. 742, holding that ratification by Congress of collections made, after suit brought, is not in violation of fifth amendment; Princess of Orange, Jewels of, 19 Fed. Cas. 1340, holding case not to be one for remission unless forfeiture has been decreed, or confessed in petition for remission; United States v. One Hundred Barrels, 1 Low. 247, Fed. Cas. 15,946, to point that fines, etc., do not accrue until judgment; Mitchell v. Cunningham, 29 Me. 383, to point that confession of forfeiture pending proceedings therefor, on application for remission, is not conclusive against owner so as to render invalid mortgage of the property executed by him.

10 Wheat. 306–311, 6 L. Ed. 328, THE DOS HERMANOS.

Captures made jure belli by noncommissioned captors are made for government, and such captor has no claim, except for salvage.

Cited in dissenting opinion in The Siren, 7 Wall. 163, 19 L. Ed. 134, arguing that vessel captured by United States man-of-war, being property of the government, was not liable for maritime tort, since its owner, the government, was not liable; The Siren, 13 Wall. 393, 20 L. Ed. 506, in general discussion upon rights of captors, to point that no rights exist except those expressly granted by the government; Carrington v. Insurance Co., 8 Pet. 522, 8 L. Ed. 1031, holding seizure legal and for benefit of government though made by a noncommissioned cruiser; The Ella Warley, Blatchf. Pr. 207, Fed. Cas. 4371, to point that prize taken in time of war became government property; Eight Hundred and Fifty-eight Bales of Cotton, Blatchf. Pr. 326, Fed. Cas. 4318, holding captured cotton was government property and government liable to pay freight therein contracted for by its competent agent; The Siren, 1 Low. 282, Fed. Cas. 12,911, holding ship falling into hands of government forces, upon surrender of enemy's port became government property without any particular persons being captors; The Deer, 1 Low. 95, Fed. Cas. 3739, where persons not in the navy who rendered services in connection with capture were given salvage; Seventy-eight Bales, 1 Low. 18, Fed. Cas. 12,679, where goods, property of enemy, abandoned and picked up at sea by government cruiser, held prize of war, and therefore government property, out of which captors were entitled to salvage only; The Rita, 89 Fed. 768, holding officers and men of auxiliary cruiser not regularly enlisted in navy entitled to prize money.

Mode of taking and perfecting security on appeal are matters of discretion for lower court, and Supreme Court will not interfere with its exercise.

Approved in Blaffer v. New Orleans Water Supply Co., 160 Fed. 390, 393, 87 C. C. A. 341, holding that appeal, not being taken within six months allowed by law, court had no jurisdiction to hear it; Walker v. Houghtaling, 104 Fed. 514, holding where plaintiff in error has failed to file bond on writ of error, but the writ has been issued and served, and cause transferred to Circuit Court of Appeals, that court has power after time has expired to retain cause and permit filing of bond in amount prescribed, but not to act as supersedeas; Noonan v. Chester Park Athletic Club Co., 93 Fed. 577, holding allowance of appeal by trial court within six months from entry of decree is sufficient to save case from bar of statute; Anson v. Railroad Co., 23 How. 2, 16 L. Ed. 518, where court permitted appellant to give bond for costs after regular time expired; United States v. Adams, 6 Wall. 107, 18 L. Ed. 793, where held that by taking initiatory steps in time, appellant had conformed to law and rules of court, and subsequent delay in perfecting appeal did not invalidate it; Edmonson v. Bloomshire, 7 Wall. 311, 19 L. Ed. 92, holding filing bond not necessary for existence of appeal so as to start time running within which transcript must be filed; Bigler v. Waller, 12 Wall. 149, 20 L. Ed. 262, denying motion to dismiss appeal because bond defective, and granting leave to file new bond; Peugh v. Davis, 110 U. S. 228, 28 L. Ed. 128, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, holding where appeal allowed by court in session, acting judicially, without taking bond, judge of appellate court could nevertheless, after expiration of sixty days, grant a supersedeas; Wickelman v. Dick Co., 85 Fed. 851, 57 U. S. App. 199, allowing appellant time to give security on appeal notwithstanding expiration of six months from date of decree; Barnum's Appeal, 33 Conn. 127, where appeal held valid when applied for and granted within statutory time, though bond not given till later. See also Green v. Lynn, 87 Fed. 840, holding merely filing petition without obtaining order allowing appeal within time, insufficient.

Distinguished in Adams v. Law, 16 How. 148, 14 L. Ed. 882, holding that where an appeal operated as a supersedeas, the law must have been strictly complied with and bond given within ten days after decree.

Practice and procedure governing transfer of causes to Federal Supreme Court for review. Note, 66 L. R. A. 849, 858.

Amount of salvage is within sound discretion of the District Court, and will not ordinarily be disturbed on appeal.

Cited in The Schooner Emulous, 1 Sumn. 215, Fed. Cas. 4480, where appellate court, with great reluctance, reduced salvage allowed by District Court, because exorbitant.

Review of salvage award. Note, 20 Ann. Cas. 564.

10 Wheat. 312–332, 6 L. Ed. 329, THE JOSEFA SEGUNDA.

District Court in admiralty may determine who was captor of vessel violating slave trade and entitled to share in proceeds of vessel and cargo.

Cited in United States v. George, 6 Blatchf. 46, Fed. Cas. 15,197, sustaining jurisdiction of court to decree distribution of penalties after condemnation; Robinson v. Hook, 4 Mason, 144, Fed. Cas. 11,956, in argument, sustaining jurisdiction of court to decree distribution of proceeds after condemnation therein; s. c., p. 148, Fed. Cas. 11,956, to point that such court had exclusive jurisdiction to decide who was the informer entitled to share such proceeds; Price v. Forrest, 173 U. S. 425, discussing rights of heir of a claimant to funds in court's possession.

Distinguished in dissenting opinion in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. 486, 12 L. Ed. 248, arguing against jurisdiction of admiralty court in case of collision on navigable river within a county.

To constitute capture so as to entitle captor to proceeds of forfeiture, there must be open, visible possession claimed and authority exercised.

Cited in Fideliter v. United States, 1 Sawy. 155, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 578, Fed. Cas. 4755, denying jurisdiction and dismissing libel because no seizure alleged.

Seizure voluntarily abandoned or not followed by prosecution or claim insisting upon captor's rights becomes void.

Cas. 15,892, where jurisdiction defeated by bonding and releasing of property seized before filing information; Tracey v. Corse, 58 N. Y. 151, holding District Court had no jurisdiction to condemn barge which had passed from its custody by unauthorized sale by collector.

Under slave trade act of 1807, anyone may seize vessel violating act, and proceeds are forfeited to government.

Approved in United States v. Two Barrels of Desiccated Eggs, 185 Fed. 305, holding that proceedings under food and drug act are not within admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of Federal courts; United States v. George Spraul & Co., 185 Fed. 407, 107 C. C. A. 569, holding that in cases of seizures under pure food and drug act, courts proceed as court of common-law jurisdiction on trial by jury; Charge to Grand Jury, 30 Fed. Cas. 1027, holding seizure under slave trade act could be made by anyone.

Bank notes ordinarily pass as money, and are good tender, unless specially objected to.

Approved in dissenting opinion in Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 625, 20 L. Ed. 336, in argument upon constitutionality of legal tender acts, as applied to contracts antedating their passage; Legal Tender Case, 110 U. S. 445, 28 L. Ed. 213, 4 Sup. Ct. 128, holding act making treasury notes legal tender constitutional; Woodruff v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 300, 40 L. Ed. 976, 16 Sup. Ct. 823, defining "money" as including bank notes; Corbit v. Bank, 2 Harr. (Del.) 252, 30 Am. Dec. 636, following rule; People v. Mayhew, 26 Cal. 663, holding valid payment in treasury notes by redemptioner to sheriff for purchaser in absence of objection by sheriff; Bank v. Rushmore, 28 Ill. 471, where bank collected and deposited to their credit debt due plaintiffs in currency, which subsequently depreciated, held the deposit was general and bank liable therefor; Ridenour v. McClurkin, 6 Blackf. 414, upholding payment made in depreciated currency where neither party knew of the depreciation; Boyd v. Olvey, 82 Ind. 300, upholding redemption where national bank notes paid to and accepted by clerk of court for use of purchaser, and clerk thereafter held himself ready to pay amount in lawful money; Jones v. Overstreet, 4 T. B. Mon. 550, where bank notes of the Bank of Kentucky regarded as money for purposes of satisfaction of execution and recovery for face value thereof had against sheriff; Doyle v. Commissioners, 12 Gill & J. 494, where bank notes, deposited as a wager, held to be money within meaning of law forfeiting all money so deposited to the county; Duffy v. O'Donovan, 46 N. Y. 228, holding tender of certified check good, where not objected to, because not legal tender; Shallenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. St. 85, sustaining constitutionality of act making treasury notes legal tender; State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 4, holding judgment satisfied by sheriff collecting amount thereof in Confederate treasury notes at a time when such notes passed as currency; Rodgers v. Bass, 46 Tex. 516, holding debt discharged by payment in Confederate notes, during the war, to creditor's agent in Texas; Klauber v. Biggerstaff, 47 Wis. 559, 32 Am. Rep. 778, 3 N. W. 361, where word "currency," in certificate of deposit, was held to include bank notes in circulation at par with coin.

Distinguished in Corbit v. Bank, 2 Harr. (Del.) 270, 30 Am. Dec. 651, holding deposit by bank to plaintiff's credit, of notes of insolvent bank, did not render it liable for face value thereof.

Explained in Bank v. Lightbody, 13 Wend. 107, 27 Am. Dec. 183, holding payment in notes of insolvent bank, though parties ignorant of the insolvency, was not a satisfaction of the debt; dissenting opinion in Currie v. White, 45 N. Y. 842, holding offer of payment in checks not tender.

Greene, 472, holding sale of interest in plaintiff firm from pending suit did not constitute vendor competent witness; Pino v. Beckwith, 1 N. M. 27, refusing to admit defendant's testimony.

Modified in Snyder v. Fiedler, 139 U. S. 480, 35 L. Ed. 219, 11 Sup. Ct. 584, holding plaintiff, an administratrix, competent witness after appointment of her successor; Lizardi v. Cohen, 3 Gill, 436, holding defendant of record who had no interest a competent witness.

Distinguished in Pryor v. Ryburn, 16 Ark. 692, holding objection to testimony of party without interest, waived by stipulation of counsel filed.

A contract invalid for usury by the laws of one State may be a good basis for new contract elsewhere.

Approved in Pacific Building Co. v. Hill, 40 Or. 293, 91 Am. St. Rep. 482, 67 Pac. 106, holding where citizen of California and foreign corporation doing business in Oregon made contract in Oregon, and payments were to be made in California, such contract being usurious by laws of Oregon but not by laws of California, the contract will not be enforced by Oregon courts; Floyd v. Nat. Loan & Investment Co., 49 W. Va. 344, 38 S. E. 661, holding a domestic building and loan association may fix minimum premium to be deducted in advance or paid in installments, but such sum must be fixed and definite, and a foreign corporation making a contract with citizen must conform to this requirement.

Usury in a contract is a mortal taint, and no subterfuge can conceal it from the eye of the law.

Approved in Ringer v. Virgin Timber Co., 213 Fed. 1008, where notes were given for amount largely in excess of purchase price, transaction was usurious; Sherwood v. Roundtree, 32 Fed. 123, holding loan usurious where part of principal withheld under name of "commission"; Phelps v. Pierson, 1 G. Greene, 128, reversing decree foreclosing usurious mortgage; Knickerbocker etc. Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 78 N. Y. 149, holding loan usurious, notwithstanding elaborate subterfuges to conceal usury; Smith v. Cross, 90 N. Y. 554, holding court would look behind transactions had to conceal usury.

Though contract be usurious in its inception, subsequent legal contract, entered into for purpose of freeing it from usury, makes it valid.

Approved in Peters Shoe Co. v. Arnold, 82 Mo. App. 6, holding debt secured by usurious mortgage may repudiate usury and correct mistake by proper contract; Building Co. v. Jones, 94 Tex. 502, 62 S. W. 743, holding where, under original contract, plaintiff was only liable for balance after deducting certain payments, because contract was usurious, a second contract, purging the first of usury, was not void as to interest for want of consideration; Masterson v. Grubbs, 70 Ala. 408, holding reformation of contract by removal and remitting excessive interest cured the usury; Mitchell v. Lyman, 77 Ill. 530, holding interest payable on note substituted for old usurious note, less excess paid on old note; Lillard v. Field, 1 J. J. Marsh. 276, 280, holding good, a note for principal, and legal interest given in consideration of original usurious loan; Hoyt v. Bridgewater etc. Mining Co., 6 N. J. Eq. 274, when subsequent agreement of parties held to have purged contract of usury; Morris v. Taylor, 22 N. J. Eq. 443, and Taylor v. Morris, 22 N. J. Eq. 610, holding usury cured by settlement between parties and giving new mortgage; Palmer v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 307, holding mortgagor estopped from setting up invalidity of assignment by agreement recognizing assignee's title; Sheldon v. Haxtun, 91 N. Y. 134, holding valid new note, complying with law of State where made, given in consideration of old usurious debt; Gerlaugh v. Bassett, 20 Wis. 678, holding contract purged of usury, by giving new note for original debt; Edgell v. Stanford, 6 Vt. 559, holding recovery allowable of original debt, though subsequent usurious contract substituted therefor.

Distinguished in Jackson v. Jones, 13 Ala. 126, holding contract tainted with old usury, where usurious interest on old notes carried into new contract; Lee v. Peckham, 17 Wis. 390, holding usurious, a new contract for sum due, including unpaid usurious interest; dissenting opinion in Sheldon v. Haxtun, 91 N. Y. 135, 136, majority holding valid new note complying with law of State where made, given in consideration of usurious debt.

Usury affecting new note. Note, 11 Am. Dec. 540.

What transactions are usurious. Note, 46 Am. St. Rep. 201.

Court will not treat usurious contract as absolutely void, when not so declared, but merely prohibited by statute.

Approved in First Nat. Bank of McEntire, 112 Ga. 235, 37 S. E. 382, holding where surety signs promissory note waiving homestead which is secretly tainted with usury unknown to him, he is not discharged from liability when note is made payable to national bank under Rev. Stats. U. S., § 5198; Oates v. National Bank, 100 U. S. 250, 25 L. Ed. 584, holding reservation of usurious interest by national bank did not make loan void; McBroom v. Scottish etc. Co., 153 U. S. 326, 38 L. Ed. 732, 14 Sup. Ct. 855 (affirming s. c., 6 N. M. 588, 30 Pac. 863), holding contract made under New Mexican law not void for usury; Wiley v. Starbuck, 44 Ind. 313, holding reservation of usurious interest by national bank did not make contract void; Haggard v. Atlee, 1 G. Greene, 46, 47, holding usurious contract not void under law of Iowa; Commercial Bank etc. v.

Nolan, 7 How. (Miss.) 527, holding principal due on usurious contract recoverable; Montany v. Rock, 10 Mo. 508, holding usurious contract not void; Farmers' Bank v. Burchard, 33 Vt. 371, holding usurious contract valid, except as to the usury; dissenting opinion in Fowler v. Throckmorton, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 334, majority holding no recovery could be had on usurious contract; Scottish etc. Co. v. McBroom, 6 N. M. 588, 30 Pac. 863, holding contract made under New Mexican law not void for usury.

Distinguished in Saltmarsh v. Tuthill, 13 Ala. 409, holding bill of exchange void for prior indorsement on Sunday, in hands of indorsee in a usurious transaction.

Plea of usury is generally personal and peculiar, and not available to third persons.

Approved in Phillips v. Ogle, 21 D. C. 207, following rule; Lefmann v. Brill, 142 Fed. 49, where wife in maintenance suit made mortgagee of husband a party, but court in awarding her husband's interest in mortgaged property refused to pass on validity of mortgage but dismissed mortgagee's cross-petition, his mortgage not having matured, decree not bar to subsequent foreclosure; In re Worth, 130 Fed. 931, under Iowa Code 1897, § 3041, making usurious contract voidable only to extent of usurious interest, creditors of bankrupt cannot set up defense of usury against claim of another creditor; Edgell v. Ham, 93 Fed. 764, holding where mortgage not usurious on its face by lex loci rei sitae is foreclosed, conveyance to purchaser cannot be attacked for usury in mortgage; Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 581, 74 Pac. 138, holding where mortgage is foreclosed for amount of principal and interest which, under Cal. Const., art. XIII, § 4, mortgagee must pay, purchaser from mortgagor cannot recover the interest from mortgagee; Barney v. Fontine Surety Co., 131 Mich. 196, 91 N. W. 142, assignee of contract cannot avail himself of defense of usury; Higbee v. Aetna Bldg. etc. Assn., 26 Okl. 330, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 223, 109 Pac. 237, purchaser of land at sale in bankruptcy proceedings cannot question mortgagor on ground of usury; Irwin v. Washington Loan Assn., 42 Or. 107, 71 Pac. 143, holding where building association mortgage is usurious on account of interest, premium and installments on stock, the whole amount is not usurious, but only the excess; Black v. Reno, 59 Fed. 923, holding usury not available defense for mortgagor in usurious transaction against holder of mortgage as collateral security; American Water-Works Co. v. Farmers' etc. Trust Co., 73 Fed. 962, 36 U. S. App. 563, holding want of authority in grantor company to execute mortgages, no defense for grantee with notice; Gatewood v. Bank, 49 Ga. 50, holding usury in first mortgage no ground for bill by later mortgagee to enjoin sale; Henderson v. Bellew, 45 Ill. 325, holding usury no defense on foreclosure, for purchaser subject to mortgage; Carmichael v. Bodfish, 32 Iowa, 420, holding stranger to contract could not plead usury; Pritchett v. Mitchell, 17 Kan. 358, 22 Am. Rep. 289, holding subsequent mortgagee could not plead usury in prior mortgage; Farmers' etc. Bank v. Kimmel, 1 Mich. 85, holding plea of usury not available to subsequent mortgagee; Ladd v. Wiggin, 35 N. H. 429, 69 Am. Dec. 558, holding usury a personal defense; Post v. Kierman, 35 Or. 352, 55 Pac. 444, holding breach of warranty is sufficiently alleged by stating title is in United States, that Secretary of Interior has withdrawn land from entry and sale, that they were occupied when deed was made, and that plaintiff has not occupied them, and has been evicted; Salle v. Light, 4 Ala. 705, 39 Am. Dec. 318, holding bad declaration on covenant of warranty omitting to allege recovery by title paramount; Dupuy v. Roebuck, 7 Ala. 488, holding where eviction by paramount title not shown, no right of action existed; Davis v. Smith, 5 Ga. 297, 48 Am. Dec. 297, holding eviction, to constitute breach of warranty, must be upon title paramount; Scott v. Kirkendall, 88 Ill. 467, 30 Am. Rep. 563, holding mere outstanding title not asserted does not constitute breach of covenant of warranty; Hannah v. Henderson, 4 Ind. 176, sustaining demurrer where no ouster or eviction alleged; Reese v. McQuilkin, 7 Ind. 451, holding declaration substantially showing eviction by title paramount sufficient; Mills v. Rice, 3 Neb. 85, holding allegation of outstanding adverse title since become perfect and ouster thereunder sufficient; Cheney v. Straube, 35 Neb. 524, 53 N. W. 480, holding sufficient, allegation of eviction by title paramount, in general terms;

Patton v. McFarlane, 3 Penr. & W. 424, holding allegation of payment of encumbrance, without eviction, would not support action on covenant of warranty; Rex v. Creel, 22 W. Va. 375, holding possession by third person under paramount title when covenant made, constitutes eviction; Watts v. Sheppard, 2 Ala. 432, holding sufficient, assignments of breaches, substantially stating intention of parties, in declaration, on bond; Bailey v. White, 3 Ala. 333, holding in declaration on covenant, assignment of breach may be accorded to intent of parties; Montgomery Mfg. Co. v. Thomas, 20 Ala. 476, holding unnecessary to use precise terms of agreement sued on in assigning breach.

Declaration in covenant, by plaintiffs claiming as heirs and devisees, without setting out will or showing how they were heirs, is not fatal on general demurrer.

Approved in Wilder v. McCormick, 2 Blatchf, 34, Fed Cas. 17,650, holding allegation of proceedings in obtaining patent unnecessary in declaration for infringement; Van Hook v. Woods, 28 Fed. Cas. 1005, holding allegation of particular acts of commissioner in extending patent unnecessary in declaration for infringement.

Where two breaches, repugnant to each other, are assigned in declaration on covenant in same count, immaterial one disregarded on general demurrer.

Cited in Mills v. Rice, 3 Neb. 86, disregarding, on general demurrer, immaterial allegation of breach, possibly inconsistent with another breach assigned.

JUDGES

OF THE

DURING THE TIME OF THESE REPORTS.

The Hon. JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice.
The Hon. BUSHROD WASHINGTON, Associate Justice.
The Hon. WILLIAM JOHNSON, Associate Justice.
The Hon. GABRIEL DUVALL, Associate Justice.
The Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Associate Justice.
The Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, Associate Justice.
WILLIAM WIRT, Esq., Attorney-General.

MEMORANDUM.

The following proceedings of the court and bar took place on the occasion of the decease of the Honorable Thomas Todd, an associate justice of this court, who died at his seat near Frankfort, in Kentucky, about the commencement of the present term:

Feb. 21st.—This court being informed that our much respected brother and associate, Mr. Justice Todd, has departed this life,

Resolved, That we will, in testimony of our sense of his worth, and of our deep feeling at the afflicting loss we have sustained, wear crape for the residue of the term.

The court, on motion of the Attorney-General, directed the following proceedings of the bar, and officers of the court, to be entered on the minutes:

"At a meeting of the bar and officers of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the court room, on Monday, the 20th day of February, 1826, Mr. Attorney-General Wirt being called to the chair, the following resolves were proposed by Mr. Webster, and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the members of this bar, and officers of the court, feel sensibly the loss which this court, and the country, have sustained in the death of the Honorable Thomas Todd, late a judge of this court.

"Resolved, That to testify their respect for the virtues and talents of the deceased, and their sense of the loss which the community has sustained by his death, the members of this bar, and the officers of the court, will wear the usual badge of mourning for the residue of the term.

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General, in behalf of the bar, and officers of the court, do respectfully move the court, that the foregoing resolutions may be entered on the minutes of its proceedings.

"WM. WIRT, Chairman."

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1826.

1°] [*Prize.]

THE MARIANNA FLORA.

The Vice-Consul of Portugal, Claimant.

In admiralty proceedings, amendments are made in the Appellate Court, not only as to form, but as to matter of substance, as by the filing a new count to the libel; the parties being permitted, whenever public justice and the substantial merits require it, to introduce new allegations and new proofs; non allegata allegare, et non probata probare.

If the amendment is made in the Circuit Court, the cause is heard and adjudicated by that court, and (upon appeal) by this court on the new allegation; but if the amendment is allowed by this court, the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to permit the amendment to be made.

An attack made upon a vessel of the United States, by an armed vessel, with the avowed intention of repelling the approach of the former, or of crippling or destroying her, upon a mistaken suposition that she was a piratical cruiser, and without a piratical or felonious intent, or for the purpose of wanton plunder, or malicious destruction of property, is not a piratical aggression under the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 75.

Nor is an armed vessel, captured under such circumstances, liable to confiscation as for a hostile aggression, under the general law of nations.

2°] *The act extends to foreign vessels committing a piratical aggression; and whatever responsibility the nation may incur towards foreign states, by executing its provisions, the tribunals of the United States are bound to carry them into effect.

Pirates may be lawfully captured by the public or private ships of any nation, in peace or in war; for they are hostes humani generis.

American ships offending against our own laws, may be seized upon the ocean, and foreign ships thus offending within our territorial jurisdiction, may be pursued and seized upon the ocean, and brought into our ports for adjudication.

But, in such cases, the party seizes at his peril, and is liable to costs and damages if he fails to establish the forfeiture.

Ships of war sailing under the authority of their government, in time of peace, have a right to approach other vessels at sea for the purpose of ascertaining their real characters, so far as the same can be done without the exercise of the right of visitation and search, which does not exist in time of peace.

No vessel is bound to await the approach of armed ships under such circumstances; but such vessel cannot lawfully prevent their approach by the use of force, upon the mere suspicion of danger.

Where an aggression was committed by a foreign armed merchant vessel, on a public armed ship of the United States, under these circumstances, and a combat ensued upon mutual misapprehension and mistake, the commander of the public ship was held exempt from costs and damages for subduing, seizing, and bringing into a port of this country for adjudication, the offending vessel.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Massachusetts.

The original libel filed in the District Court against the Portuguese ship Marianna Flora, and cargo, was for an alleged piratical aggression attempted or committed by the ship on the United States armed schooner Alligator, Lieutenant Stockton, commander, against the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 75, entitled, "An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy." [1]

*Upon the hearing of the cause in the [*3 District Court, the judge pronounced an interlocutory sentence of restitution, and subsequently pronounced a further decree for damages, amounting to $19,675, for the act of sending in the ship for adjudication, and the consequent detention. An appeal was taken by the libelants from both decrees to the Circuit Court; and afterwards, before the hearing of the appeal, by request of the government of the United States, and with the consent of the libelants, the ship and cargo were restored to the claimants, and further *proceedings re- [*4 specting the same were abandoned. The only question, therefore, litigated in the Circuit Court, was upon the point of damages, and, ultimately, a decree was there pronounced reversing the decree for damages; and this constituted the matter of the present appeal.

1.—Which provides (sec. 1) that the president of the United States be authorized and requested to employ so many of the public armed vessels as in his judgment the service may require, with suitable instructions to the commanders thereof, in protecting the merchant vessels of the United States, and their crews, from piratical aggressions and depredations. (Sec. 2) The President of the United States is authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels of the United States, to subdue, seize, take and send into any port of the United States, any armed vessel or boat, or any vessel or boat, the crew whereof shall be armed, and which shall have attempted or committed any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation or seizure, upon any vessel of the United States, or of the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessel; and also to retake any vessel of the United States, or its citizens, which may have been unlawfully captured upon the high seas. (Sec. 3) Authorizes the merchant vessels of the United States to defend themselves against any piratical aggressions, etc., and to capture the assailant. (Sec. 4) Whenever any vessel or boat, from which any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation or seizure, shall have been first attempted or made, shall be captured and brought into any port of the United States, the same shall and may be adjudged and condemned to their use, and that of the captors, after due process and trial, in any court having admiralty jurisdiction, and which shall be holden for the district into which such captured vessel shall be brought; and the same court shall thereupon order a sale and distribution thereof accordingly, and at their discretion.

Pending the proceedings in the Circuit Court, leave was granted to the libelants to file a new count or allegation, in which the aggression was stated to be hostile, and with intent to sink and destroy the Alligator, and in violation of the law of nations.

The facts which were given in evidence, and relied on to support the allegations in the libel, were substantially as follows: On the morning of the 5th of November, 1821, the Alligator and the Marianna Flora, were mutually descried by each other on the ocean, at the distance of about nine miles, the Alligator being on a cruise against pirates and slave traders, under the instructions of the President, and the Portuguese vessel being bound on a voyage from Bahia to Lisbon, with a valuable cargo on board. The two vessels were then steering on courses nearly at right angles with each other, the Marianna Flora being under the lee bow of the Alligator. A squall soon afterwards came on, which occasioned an obscuration for some time. Upon the clearing up of the weather, it appeared that the Marianna Flora had crossed the point of intersection of the courses of the two vessels, and was about four miles distant on the weather bow of the Alligator. Soon afterwards she shortened sail 5*] and hove to, having at this time a vane or flag on her mast, somewhat below the head, which, together with her other manœuvres, induced Lieutenant Stockton to suppose she was in distress, or wished for information. Accordingly, he deemed it his duty, upon this apparent invitation, to approach her, and immediately changed his course towards her. When the Alligator was within long shot of the Portuguese ship, the latter fired a cannon-shot ahead of the Alligator, and exhibited the appearance and equipments of an armed vessel. Lieutenant Stockton immediately hoisted the United States flag and pendant. The Marianna Flora then fired two more guns, one loaded with grape, which fell short, the other loaded with round shot, which passed over and beyond the Alligator. This conduct induced Lieutenant Stockton to believe the ship to be a piratical or a slave vessel, and he directed his own guns to be fired in return; but as they were only carronades, they did not reach her. The Alligator continued to approach, and the Marianna Flora continued firing at her at times, until she came within musket shot, and then a broadside from the Alligator produced such intimidation that the Portuguese almost immediately ceased firing. At that time, and not before, the Portuguese ship hoisted her national flag. Lieutenant Stockton ordered the ship to surrender, and send her boat on board, which was accordingly done. He demanded an explanation; and the statement made to him by the Portuguese master, and 6] other officers, was, that they did not *know him to be an American ship of war, but took him to be a piratical cruiser. Under these circumstances, without much examination of the papers, or the voyage of the ship, Lieutenant Stockton determined to send her into the United States, on account of this, which he deemed a piratical aggression. She was accordingly manned and sent, with her officers and crew, under the orders of Lieutenant Abbot, into Boston.

Mr. J. Knapp, for the appellants, argued (1) upon the facts, to show that the visitation of the Marianna Flora, and her detention for examination and search, were unlawful and unjustifiable. He insisted that the Portuguese master was deceived by the omission of the Alligator to affirm her flag with a gun, according to the law and usage of the nations on the European continent.[1] He had a lawful right to resist the approach of the other vessel, until assured, beyond all reasonable doubt, of her true national character.[2] A remark of Lord Ellenborough, in an analogous case, recognizes such manœuvres as were used by the Marianna Flora, as coming within the legitimate acts of defensive resistance. He says, "defense might happen in various ways, as by making a show of confidence in the face of an enemy, with a view to deter him from an attack."[3] Upon the topics of the nature or *character of [*7 unblamable defense, and the time when forcible resistance may lawfully begin, and the extent to which it may be carried, particularly between persons belonging to different civil societies, or between vessels of different nations, on the ocean, authorities were cited from various text-writers, as applicable to the situation of the Portuguese master, and justifying his conduct.[4] It was asked if it be lawful for private ships to arm, in time of peace, for the purposes of self-protection, whether that liberty did not comprehend the right to do with force whatever, under existing circumstances of apparent peril, human instinct and natural prudence would dictate. Could the maxim that we must so use what belongs to us as not to infringe the rights of others, be inconsistent with this principle? Could it be the duty of the master of a merchant vessel armed for such a purpose, when his nation was at peace with all the world, and when the seas were infested with pirates, to suffer another armed vessel to approach him without first being satisfied of her pacific intentions? Still less was it his duty to submit to the exercise of the right of visitation and search (a right which has no existence in time of peace), in the unlawful manner in which it was attempted to be exercised.[5]

2. It was insisted that if the search and examination had been made in a lawful and deliberate manner, it must have resulted in a conviction *of the innocence of the Portu- [*8 guese ship, and her consequent immediate liberation. As, in this case, simple reparation only was sought, and not vindictive damages, it was considered sufficient to refer to the case of The Apollon, where it was laid down by this court, that, except in cases of captures jure belli, or on exemption expressly created by statute, even probable cause will not excuse from simple reparation.[1] But there must, in every case, be probable cause to justify the seizure.[2]

3. But it was further contended that the subsequent detention and sending in of the ship for adjudication was wholly unjustifiable, and subjected the seizor to damages. Even the harsh and unbending rules of prize law render the captors liable to costs and damages whenever the evidence of the neutrality of the ship and cargo exists on board, unless it is afterwards shown to be enemy's property, or to have been guilty of some unneutral conduct, rendering it liable to confiscation.[3] But yet there was a distinction between a right to seize and examine, and a right to capture. The right to detain and send in for adjudication did not necessarily follow from a seizure and examination, which might have been warranted by the circumstances, but which had not resulted in showing that there was any reason 9*] *to doubt the true character of the Portuguese vessel, and the innocence of her conduct. But, at all events, the misconduct of the master, supposing it to be ever so aggravated, could not affect the owners of the ship and cargo, whose agent he was for ordinary civil purposes, but not so as to subject their property to loss or injury by his unlawful acts. And for the losses accruing by the detention of the ship and cargo in port, after it was satisfactorily ascertained that they could not be proceeded against by the seizors, there was still less reason to doubt the right of the claimants to recover damages.[4]

4. The charge that the Portuguese ship had attempted, or committed, a piratical aggression or restraint, within the act of Congress, was considered as negatived by the restitution, with the consent of the captors, in the court below. Whatever might be the nature or degree of the offense meant to be defined by the act, it must be piratical; and all the authorities define piracy to be a robbery, or forcible depredation on the high seas; and they all concur, that a bare assault, without taking or pillaging something, does not constitute this crime.[5] If the act of Congress goes beyond this 10*] definition, it is not warranted *by the law of nations, and cannot give jurisdiction to the tribunals of this country over the persons and property of foreigners.

Mr. Blake, for the respondents, made three points:

1. The captors were justifiable, under all the circumstances of the case, in subduing and taking possession of the Portuguese ship.

2. They were justifiable in sending her in for adjudication.

3. There was probable cause of seizure and sending in for adjudication.

1. Even the sentence of the District Court admits that Captain Stockton was not liable to damages for the mere act of subduing and seizing the ship. She had committed a hostile and piratical aggression on a public vessel of the United States in time of peace. The learned counsel here entered into an able and elaborate argument upon the evidence, to show that the first aggression was committed by the Portuguese ship, and that it was not justified or excused by the conduct of the Alligator. It was a predetermined, deliberate, and wanton attack; not an accidental encounter, nor the result of any mistake. It was an act of private war, and the onus probandi is on the claimant to show that it was authorized by the law of nations. Admitting even that the Alligator pursued the Portuguese vessel, she had an unquestionable right to approach her in time of peace; and an attempt to exercise the right could not be construed into *an act [*11 of hostility, or warrant the use of force to prevent it. As the ocean is the common property of all nations, every nation has a right to its free use, and no one can claim the exclusive control of a larger portion than is sufficient for the purposes of its own movements. The regulations as to keeping out of cannon-shot, and sending a boat on board, are applicable only to a state of war, and to the exercise of the belligerent right of search, which, it is admitted, does not exist in time of peace. Indeed, these regulations are the creatures of conventional law, and bind those nations only between whom they are established by special treaty. But the Alligator was a public armed ship, belonging to the navy of the United States; and sent out to cruise against pirates and slave traders, under the different acts of Congress passed for the suppression of these offenders. Captain Stockton was authorized by these laws, and his instructions under them, to seize and subdue all vessels and persons offending against them, wherever they might be found. If every vessel on the ocean has a right to draw around her a magic circle, and to prevent by force the approach of all others, it is obvious that the acts of Congress must remain a dead letter, since they could not be executed without approaching sufficiently near to ascertain the probable character of the vessel. The act of heaving to, on the part of the Marianna Flora, indicated either a desire to speak the Alligator, or to get the weathergage for the purposes of annoyance; and, in either case, it was the duty *of Captain [*12 Stockton to change his course, and overhaul the Portuguese ship. But the circumstance of the hostile guns which were soon afterwards fired from the Marianna Flora, without hoisting any national flag, made it still more imperatively his duty to approach her; and had he avoided the recounter, he could not have justified his conduct to his government and his country. He had a right, then, to pursue and capture, founded upon the act of Congress, and his instructions. He was justified in considering the ship as having not only attempted, but as having actually committed, a piratical restraint and aggression, within the meaning of the act.

But, independent of the authority derived from this statute, he was justified in pursuing and subduing the aggressor, upon the more general grounds of natural and public law. The right of freely navigating the ocean, and of self-defense, of repelling force by force, was common to both vessels. The Alligator was not bound to decline the combat by flight. In the expressive words of Baron Puffendorf, "in a state of nature, the aggressor hath no right, by which the other party is bound to decline his violence rather than oppose it; and the reason why a man, under his natural condition, sometimes chooses rather to fly than fight, is not out of any favor to him who sets upon him, but because he thinks it more convenient for his own affairs to fly, like hares, 13*] whose armor is in their feet."[1] *This doctrine has reference to the condition of man in a state of nature; and such was the condition of the parties now before the court, when upon the ocean, and waging war with each other. The vindices injuriarum were not there, and each party became of necessity his own avenger and judge. As to the Alligator not firing a gun in affirmance of her flag, it cannot surely be pretended that such an idle ceremony could give any additional assurance that she was what she pretended to be, or that the general law of maritime states requires any such ceremony. It may be the particular usage of Spain and Portugal, and it may have been adopted between some other nations as a part of the conventional law; but it has reference exclusively to a state of war, and is a mere regulation of the exercise of the belligerent right of visitation and search.

Still less can it be maintained that the Portuguese had reasonable grounds to suspect that the Alligator was a pirate, and had hostile designs upon his ship, and therefore he had a right to attack and destroy her. The analogies of the municipal law may assist to illustrate this branch of the inquiry. What degree, or what grounds of fear of bodily harm, will justify an act that may result in the destruction of human life is, in some cases, a question of great delicacy and difficulty. By the rules of the common law, the rights of the party assailed are confined within very narrow limits. The danger must be manifest, impending, and almost unavoidable. But the writers 14*] on natural law may, perhaps, on this *occasion, be more properly cited; and the following passage from Puffendorf affords the fullest illustration of the principles applicable to this subject: "Sometimes," says he, "a doubt has arisen whether, if one assault me, by mistake, without any evil design, but with intent to employ his force against another, I may kill him in my own defense. Grotius makes this clear in the affirmative. De J. B. ac P., lib. 11, c. 1, s. 2. Inasmuch as nature obliges us to maintain peace with others, it may, and ought to be presumed that everyone will fulfill this obligation, unless he give manifest evidence of contrary designs." "But now," (speaking of timely preparations for self-defense,) "though my providing thus far for my security can be injurious to none, yet, before I can actually assault another under color of my own defense, I must have tokens and arguments amounting to a moral certainty that he entertains a grudge against me, and has a full design of doing me a mischief, so that, unless I prevent him, I shall immediately feel his stroke. Among these tokens and signs giving me a right to make a violent assault upon another man, I must by no means reckon his bare superiority to me in strength and power. 'Tis a very gross way of philosophizing which some men have got, when they tell us, by way of advice: 'He that is able to hurt you, undoubtedly is willing, and therefore, without further warning, down with him.' This kind of doctrine is manifestly destructive of all social commerce among men, and the authors commonly cited in *defense of it, [*15 either are such whose character prevents their authority, or else, in the passages alleged from them they speak only of precaution in our dealing with those who have given us sufficient tokens of their resolution to hurt us."[2]

The application of these principles to the case now in judgment, is too plain to require illustration, and seems to leave no doubt that the respondents are fully justified as to the act of subduing and capturing the appellant's ship.

The counsel also commented upon a passage from Albericus Gentilis, which had been relied on by the learned judge of the District Court as supporting his decree, but which, it was contended, had been misunderstood; and, at all events, was but the opinion of a private individual against the solemn judgment of a court of justice in a case analogous to that now in discussion.[3]

1.—l. 2 c. 13, s. 14.

2.—Puffend. l. 2, c. 5, s. 6.

3.—Albericus Gentilis, Hispanicæ Advocationis, c. 27.

Albericus Gentilis is justly regarded as one of the founders of the modern law of nations. He was born in the March of Ancona, in the year, 1550, and left Italy with his father, an eminent physician, who was obliged to fly from that country on account of his religious opinions. The son afterwards established himself in England, where he obtained a chair of professor of the civil law at Oxford, in 1582, and died at London in 1608. His works are: De Jure Belli, in three books; De Criminæ Lesæ Majestatis; De Nuptiis; Comment. ad. L. 3; Cod. de Professoribus et Medicis; and the work above referred to, Hispanicæ Advocationis, which is a collection of opinions given by him as the counsel of Spanish claimants in the English courts of prize, and may be considered as the earliest reports of adjudged cases of maritime law. Moreri, Dict. "Albericus Gentilis," says Sir James Mackintosh, "was certainly the forerunner of Grotius. The opinion entertained, at the time, of the difference between them, will be seen in the following words of Zouch, the pupil and successor of Gentilis at Oxford: 'He chiefly followed Albericus Gentilis, and Hugo Grotius, of whom the former justifies all his positions by authorities of law, the latter tried his doctrines by the test of reason.'" Edinb. Rev. Vol. XXVII. No. 53, art. 9.

Singular mutability of human opinions! Nearly all the writers cited by Gentilis are now forgotten; he himself is hardly known except by name; even Grotius is little read, and, however extensive the effects of his great work on his own age, it is now considered as resting more on the authority of the innumerable writers of every age and nation cited by him, than on original principles, or the deduction of reason.

The editor has supposed that the following translation of the passage from Gentilis, above referred to, would not be unacceptable to the reader;

"Concerning an English vessel which fought with a Tuscan, and was taken.

"An English ship was captured by a Tuscan, after an engagement, and confiscated. The Florentine judges state, as the ground of this decree, that the English ship was the aggressor, and that the Florentine acted only in necessary defense.

16*] 2. The captors were equally justifiable in sending her in for adjudication. It was 17] the exercise both of a right and a duty. Taking it for granted, that there was a right to 18] subdue, and to capture, the right to send in for adjudication follows as a corollary. The 19] right to seize depended upon *the fact of the offense committed by the captured vessel. The captors had no authority to apply the law to the fact, to sit in judgment upon the case, and to inflict summary justice on the offender. Still less could the commander of a public ship be expected to assume the responsibility of suffering the offender to escape. It was apparently a piratical, or, at least, a hostile aggression against the law of nations, which had been committed upon a public vessel of the United States. It is not essential to constitute the piratical restraint and depredation which is meant to be punished by the act of Congress, that there should be an intent to rob or plunder. Any wanton attack on a vessel, on the high seas, and especially an attack with an intent to sink the vessel, and destroy the lives of the officers and crew, is clearly within the letter and spirit of the act. If a homicide had been occasioned by this aggression it could not be considered as justifiable or excusable, upon the principles of the criminal code of this, or any other civilized country; and not being justifiable or excusable, it would be a *case of murder, and if a case of mur- [*20 der, of piratical murder. Now, if the act attempted to be done would have been piratical, the attempt also was piratical. It may, indeed, be said that the act of Congress is broader than the rule of international law on this subject; that, by the law of nations, an attempt to commit a piracy is not a piracy; and, therefore, the detention and sending in for adjudication was unlawful. Supposing this to be so, argumenti gratia, still the judicial tribunals of this country are bound to protect the officer who acts under it, and in obedience to it. This very question of an apparent collision between the law of nations and a municipal ordinance, was presented to the mind of that great man who presides in the British High Court of Admiralty, in the memorable case of the orders in council, and disposed of without hesitation or

With submission, your honors, I will reply that your premises are void of probability, your conclusion of truth. For instance; he is presumed the aggressor, who supposed himself injured; in such a case, where it is a question of intention, opinion is sufficient. The Tuscan may have supposed himself injured by the commerce of the English with the Turks. Therefore, the Tuscan, not the Englishman, was the aggressor. Again; he is presumed the aggressor who lies in wait, in arms. Such was the case of the Tuscan, who (as appears from what he had done to other vessels of ours) was cruising for our merchantmen in that trade. Again; he is presumed the aggressor, who is superior in strength. And who does not see the Tuscan vessel of war was stronger than our merchantman? Again; he is presumed the aggressor, who, being armed, is accustomed to conflicts. Does this character also suit the merchantman, or, rather, the cruiser? Finally; he is presumed the aggressor, who, under the circumstances already stated, conquers. And which is he? Why do we ask? The decree of condemnation declares that the Tuscan first fired twice on the Englishman.

"Again: Did not the Tuscan begin the battle? He is considered as beginning who has provoked to the battle, to hostility; and he is considered principal in the crime, with whom the malice began, and to him, as the aggressor, are justly imputed the consequences. And will those judges tell me that it is a practice and sign of amity to fire once and again? It is the custom of a ship of war hailing another vessel, and assuming this authority. The Tuscan vessels practiced this at that time, and in other cases. Then, the defense of the English was against a claim of authority —against threats. The object of the Tuscans was to search our ship, as appears from their transactions with others; they came, therefore, to interrupt our navigation, to intercept our commerce, as appears from what they did with others. Deeds declare the intention. The deed of the Tuscans was unlawful, if a huntsman cannot lawfully enter another man's farm without the owner's permission; if it is unlawful to injure an enemy, in a neutral territory, and if territory in this respect differ not from jurisdiction. Neither shall the custom above alluded to (if ever anywhere so received) be now obtruded upon me as a law of the sea relative to the power of ships of war; for, although the custom may be admitted on the shores of the prince to whom the vessel belongs, it cannot in other seas. Nor let us regard the opinion of those customary jurists, but adhere to those who proceed on general principles." They teach that "The defense of the English was just, fearing an attack. And the bare preparation of another against one giving me a right to assault and slay him. In fact, I am not obliged to wait till I am assailed. I have a right to commence. This is the opinion more favorable to humanity, and proved from facts on trial, and is also confirmed by all the writers. 'We must go to meet the assault, say they, not only that which actually exists, but that which may take place.'

"The defense of the English was justifiable even on the behalf of the Turks, who were to suffer injury from the Tuscans in our ship. For an injury is done to us, which is done to another in our house; and a ship is compared to a house. So, an injury done to a fellow-trader, is done to us. It was, therefore, commendable for us to defend those whom we had undertaken to carry Nay, we ourselves were entitled to be spared, although carriers" of enemy's property, simply as such "should not be so entitled. It was still necessary for us to defend ourselves, through fear lest we should suffer, by being confounded with the Turks, and by a wish to save our own property. Thus, in a case still harder to defend, Cravetta held, when a city shut its gates on its lord, through fear of being ravaged, and for the sake of preserving its property, and in order that, with a few guilty, the remaining innocent might not be confounded.

"If, then, it was a defense of ourselves, and a just defense, the attack of the Tuscans must have been unjust. But, grant that their attack was just. Certainly, in the doubtful conflict of just attack, and just defense, everyone will think the defense entitled to favor. There are all degrees of just, equitable and favored, and that which is more just is to be preferred to that which is less so. But, grant that the assault was on our side, and that it was unjust. Shall a stipulated surrender avail us nothing? They are not regarded as captured, who have surrendered, even from extreme necessity.

"But, grant that they were captured, are persons and property captured the perquisites of the captor? On this supposition, there is a kind of war between us and the Tuscans, and this a battle between enemies, which, therefore, must be adjudged by the public rules of war, and not those of pirates and murderers. The most learned Alciati is to the contrary, and the plainest law teaches that neither captured persons nor goods accrue to the captor.

"But, grant that captured goods do accrue to the captor: the goods, in this case, did not belong to the combatants; and the deed of these mariners must not prejudice the owners. The mariners are not to be understood to have done wrong by the order of the owners; nor the latter to have given orders otherwise than according to mercantile usage. 'The owners must not suffer, although the mariners should say they had acted according to orders.'

"See how, even in the liberal concessions I have made in the defense, the mariners would hardly be responsible, the owners not at all. But, since the defense of the mariners was on every principle just, what follows but that the Tuscans should restore to us, as to persons plundered, everything taken away, with damages, costs, interest, profits, etc., to the last farthing?"

difficulty, upon the plain and intelligible ground that he could not presume the prize ordinances of his own country to be repugnant to the law of nations.[1]

But, supposing it not to be a piratical aggression, or an attempt to commit one, still it was an act of deliberate, wanton, flagrant hostility, committed against the laws of nations, and the rights of this country as one of the community of nations. For such an offense there must be some punishment, and the appropriate penalty inflicted in analogous cases is that of confiscation. Thus, in the case of 21*] The Anne,[2] this court condemned, *as prize of war, enemy's property taken within neutral jurisdiction, upon the ground that the captured vessel had made the first attack upon the captor, and, by this act of aggression on the other belligerent, had disturbed the state of peace which is always supposed to exist in a neutral port.

3. There was probable cause, such as will exempt the captors from damages. Probable cause is, where a seizure is made under circumstances which warrant suspicion, and upon evidence less than that which would justify condemnation.[3] No case can be shown where a court of the law of nations has decreed damages merely for bringing in for adjudication, if the original seizure was justifiable, unless under peculiar circumstances not affecting the principle, or its application to the present case. The learned counsel here cited and classified all the cases to be found in the English books, where damages had been given or refused; and deduced from them the general inference, that wherever there is probable cause for the original seizure, the captors are only liable to make simple restitution, even if upon adjudication it turns out that their suspicions were groundless.[4]

*As to the decision of this court in [*22 Murray v. The Charming Betsey,[5] it is affirmed by Mr. *Dallas, arguendo, as a general [*23 principle of maritime law, that probable cause will justify a marine seizure, is not denied by the opposite counsel, and is impliedly conceded by the court in its judgment, the whole scope of which goes upon *an inference of [*24 fact from the evidence, that there was not probable cause of seizure, showing that if there had been, damages would not have been given. In Little v. Bareme,[6] the court did not deem it necessary to determine whether the probable cause afforded by the conduct of the captured vessel to suspect her of being an American, would exempt the captors from damages, because it was of opinion that had she been so, the seizure would still not have been warranted by the law. And the case of Maley v. Shattuck[7] was the application of the ordinary principle of the Prize Court, that if the seizure is without probable cause, the captors are liable to make restitution, with costs and dam-

4.—The three classes of cases affecting this question, are, (1) Where damages have been given or refused on restitution. (2) Where compensation has been given, or refused, the prize being lost in the hand of the captors. (3) Where, although restitution was decreed, the captors have been allowed their costs and expenses.

1. In the Cortier Maritimo, 1 Rob. 287, demurrage was given for unnecessary detention, and unjustifiable delay in proceeding to adjudication. In The Zee Star, 4 Rob. 71, demurrage was given to the claimants, and costs and expenses refused to the captors (which are usually allowed even on restitution), for improper delay in proceeding to adjudication. In The Triton, 4 Rob. 78, costs and damages were given to the claimant of the goods, and demurrage for the ship, for seizure on an insufficient ground. In The Madonna del Burso, 4 Rob. 169, all the circumstances concurred of a seizure originally unjustifiable, protracted detention, and improper delay in proceeding to adjudication; costs and damages were given. The Peacock, 4 Rob. 185, was the case of an unjustifiable detention of the prize vessel, carried into Lisbon, and delay in bringing her home to England for adjudication. The Wilhelmsburg, 5 Rob. 143, demurrage allowed, and the expenses of the application given against the captors, for loss arising from his not bringing the captured vessel to the most convenient port for adjudication, within the meaning of the prize act. In The Zacheman, 5 Rob. 152, which was a mistake as to the law of contraband under the Swedish treaty, and the seizure was pronounced perfectly justifiable, demurrage was allowed for unreasonable delay. The Anna, 5 Rob. 332, was a case of restitution, with costs and damages, for a violation of the neutral territory of the United States. The seizure itself was pronounced to be unjustifiable, and costs and damages were given because the prize ship was improperly brought from the mouth of the Mississippi to England for adjudication, instead of being carried into one of the West India Islands. In The Washington, 6 Rob. 275, damages were given for bringing the vessel to an inconvenient port. The Acteon, 2 Dods. 48, was an American ship sailing under a license, unlawfully seized and burnt. The St. Antonio, Acton, 113, was sailing under a license to enter the port of Holland, but was seized under suspicion of an intention to go to a French port. On bringing in, the captors offered to liberate on payment of their expenses, but afterwards retracted, and went on to adjudication. There was a decree of restitution, and the claimants appealed to the lords for costs and damages; the appeal was rejected, and the claimants condemned to pay the costs of the appeal. In The Catharina Elizabeth, Acton, 309, costs and damages were given by the lords for carrying the captured vessel to an inconvenient port. In The Louis, 2 Dods. 210, damages were refused by Sir W. Scott, although he held the seizure clearly illegal, it being a case of the first impression.

II. The rule on the subject of compelling the captors to proceed to adjudication, where the property is lost in their hands, is, that where the seizure is unjustifiable, the captor is answerable for every loss or damage. In cases of justifiable seizure, he is responsible for due diligence only, and is held to simple restitution in value.

The Carolina, 4 Rob. 255, was a neutral ship which had been employed in carrying French troops to Egypt, and was taken coming away. Had she been taken in actual delicto, she would have been liable to condemnation. The captors were held exempt, not only from costs and damages, but from restitution in value, the ship having been lost while in their possession by stress of weather. In The William, 6 Rob. 316, the original seizure was held justifiable, but restitution in value was decreed for a loss occasioned by not taking a pilot on board, but no damages were given. In The Der Mohr, 3 Rob. 129, the original seizure was considered as justifiable, but the captors were held responsible to make restitution in value (not for costs and damages) on account of the loss of the vessel by the ignorance and wilfulness of the prizemaster.

III. In general, the captors are allowed their expenses and costs on restitution, whenever there is probable cause of capture. The Imina, 3 Rob. 167: The Principe Edw. 70. The only exceptions to this rule are where there has been some negligence or misconduct on the part of the captors. There are a great number of cases on this head, which it was deemed unnecessary to cite.

ages, even if the property be lost without their fault; evidently implying that if there had been probable cause for the original seizure, they would not have been so liable.

Mr. Webster, on the same side, entered into a minute examination of the evidence, in order to show that the party, who was in fact the wrong-doer, and the aggressor, now appeared before the court in the character of a plaintiff, seeking redress for a supposed injury done to himself. It had been said that the owners of the ship, and of the cargo, were not to be held responsible for the misconduct of the master. There were two answers to this objection: (1) That it was not the captors who were 25*] seeking *to punish the owners, but the owners who were seeking compensation against the captors for the consequences of the misconduct of their own agent. (2) That the universal principle, applied by courts administering the law of nations, was to consider the thing taken in delicto, as responsible, whether it was the property of the master or of others. In cases of blockade, of contraband, of carrying enemy's property with false papers, of resistance to visitation and search, he is considered as the agent of the owner both of ship and cargo. So, also, the revenue laws, from the necessity of the case, regard him in that character, and subject the vessel and goods under his control to confiscation for his unlawful acts. In every case, until the innocent are separated from the guilty, until examination and regular adjudication can be had, the law is compelled to regard the ship, and everything on board, as belonging to the master.

It had also been contended that, though the original seizure might be justifiable, the captors were liable in costs and damages for not releasing the vessel after she was subdued and seized. But it was not pretended that Captain Stockton had authority to punish her himself; and, therefore, unless the Portuguese ship had, notwithstanding all that had happened, a clear right to go off with impunity, he had an unquestionable right to send her in for adjudication. If she had a right to pursue her voyage, she would have had the same right if the consequences of her aggression had been ever so calamitous; if she had 26*] *crippled the Alligator and destroyed half her crew. The actual consequences being less serious, do not affect the right, though they may the exercise of discretion. But we have nothing to do here with the question of military discretion. The captured vessel had made war. She had committed what was, prima facie, a piratical restraint and depredation. If unexplained, it was piracy. Whether it could be satisfactorily explained, or excused, was a question to be decided by the civil tribunals. It was not too much to say that the captors had here something of a belligerent right. The act of Congress was not a mere municipal law; it was a prize ordinance. The seizure was not a mere municipal seizure. War against pirates existed, and the act was intended to define who should be treated as pirates. And, even if the court should now be of opinion that the captured vessel ought not, under all the circumstances, to be sent in, still the question recurs, whether Captain Stockton might not, at that time, have thought otherwise. He was called on, suddenly, to decide and act on a question full of difficulties, and which has occasioned no little embarrassment to the civil tribunals, with all the advantages of a deliberate examination. Even with these advantages, the learned judges of the courts below have differed in their judgments upon it; and yet, it is now contended that this naval commander was bound to be better instructed in the laws than those whose peculiar duty it is to study and expound them. Upon these grounds it was that Sir W. Scott *determined, in the [*27 case of The Louis,[1] that it being a case primæ impressionis, the captors were exempt from costs and damages, although the court was clearly of opinion that the seizure itself was unjustifiable, a right to search not existing in time of peace. A doubt respecting the true construction of the law, is as reasonable a ground for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact.[2] But, here was doubt respecting both fact and law, and that doubt is not yet cleared up. The capture was made in repelling what appeared, at the time, to be an act of piratical aggression. It has turned out not to be so, after a judicial examination. But the question is, what it appeared to be recenti facto. It cannot be maintained that an habitual course of piratical depredation is necessary to constitute the offense of piracy. A single act of piratical aggression, stimulated by revenge, or national prejudice, or wanton cruelty, would be sufficient. The act of Congress evidently supposes it, and is in conformity with the public law.

It had also been argued that this was a municipal seizure, and that the vessel having been restored without a certificate of probable cause, costs and damages followed as a matter of course. But it was insisted that municipal seizures are for offenses within our own territorial jurisdiction, or by our own citizens elsewhere. Here, the proceedings are under the law of nations; and, if found guilty, the property would be condemned, *not for a [*28 municipal offense, but as prize, and distributed as prize. And, even if it had been a municipal seizure, it could not be admitted that such consequences would necessarily follow in every case, without regard to its circumstances. The true principle applicable to seizures of every kind was, that the party having a right to cruise, and bring in some vessels, if others so conduct as to give themselves the character of those who are liable to capture, they would be entitled to nothing but simple restitution. This is laid down in clear and satisfactory terms by Sir W. Scott: "The natural rule is, that if the party has been unjustly deprived of his property, he ought to be put as nearly as possible in the same state as he was before deprivation took place; technically speaking, he is entitled to restitution with costs and damages. This is the general rule; but, like all other general rules, it must be subject to modifications. If, for instance, any circumstances appear which show that the suffering party has himself furnished occasion for the capture; if he has, by his own conduct, in some degree contributed to the loss; then he is entitled to a somewhat less degree of compensation—to what is technically called simple restitution."[1]

1.—2 Dods. Rep. 210, 264.

Mr. Emmett, for the appellants, in reply, argued that the second count in the libel filed in the Circuit Court, charging a hostile aggression, was inadmissible, as the original subject-29*] matter *of the suit was originally cognizable in the District Court (where the ship and cargo had been acquitted from the original charge of a piratical aggression), and to allow such an amendment would be to institute an original, and not an appellate proceeding, in the Circuit Court.

The appellants were entitled to damages as claimed. The capturing vessel derived her right under the municipal law. The piracy alluded to in the act of Congress is sea robbery. It is an act to protect commerce; and the history of the times shows that the great evil to be remedied was the system of depredations on the ocean. They were, indeed, frequently accompanied with murder, and various other enormities. But these were only subservient to the system of plunder, and intended only to facilitate or conceal the crimes of the offenders. The piracy referred to is, that by the law of nations, and not by any peculiar law of the United States.[2] And, even if our statutory piracy had been contemplated in this act, it would not apply to the present case. The crimes act of 1790 defines the piracy created by that statute to be "murder, or robbery, or any other offense which, if committed within the body of a county would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death." Now, as the firing by the Portuguese did no mischief, no offense was committed which, if committed on land, would be punishable 30*] with *death. Besides, it has been determined that this section of the crimes act does not extend to foreign vessels.[3] For the purposes of this case, then, if not for the purposes of every case, it may be assumed that the piratical aggression mentioned in the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, must be with intent to rob or plunder. Nor can the act affect the antecedent rights of other nations. It did not, and could not, create a state of war. Pirates are, indeed, called hostes humani generis; but the use of such metaphorical language is often calculated to mislead, and to confound our ideas of legal rights. They are, indeed, public offenders, like the highway robber, but they are not public enemies so as to give those who cruise against them any of the rights of war in respect to the subject of friendly states who are not involved in their guilt. The act could not give to our own ships the right of visitation and search, or any other belligerent rights, so far as respects foreign nations. It could not affect the pre-existing right of Portuguese subjects to maintain for themselves the privileges of a state of peace. Its utmost effect would be to impose on vessels of this country the obligation to submit to examination, and the seizures it authorizes must be regarded as strictly municipal. The commissioned vessel must, therefore, act on credible information, or on evidence it has of acts of piracy. A claim to examine *or detain vessels of another nation on [*31 suspicion, without information or evidence, would be as large as the belligerent right of search, though under another name. If the commissioned vessel acts against a foreign vessel, it acts at its own peril, and (more especially when it acts without information or evidence) must abide the consequences as to damages if it has acted erroneously. In captures jure belli, if there be probable cause, the captors are entitled, as of right, to an exemption from damages; but in case of a municipal seizure, there must be some provision of positive law creating and defining the exemption. The party who seizes does it at his peril; if condemnation follows, he is justified; if an acquittal, then he must make compensation, unless he can protect himself under some statute.[4]

It has been said, that under this construction, the act would become a dead letter. The same was said in the case of The Louis, and the answer of Sir W. Scott to the objection is conclusive and pertinent to the present case

But the objection is unfounded. The dangerous pirates are, for the most part, not difficult to distinguish. Their haunts, their habits, their appearance, point them out; and though the commissioned officer acts at his own risk, yet if he acts on those indicia, and on information and evidence, and stays his hand where he can find no trace or evidence of guilt, he incurs no real danger *of being [*32 liable to damages; and, in any event, may rely on the justice and liberality of his own government for protection. This is also the doctrine of the municipal law in analogous cases on land, both criminal and revenue proceedings.

One of the privileges of a state of peace, which the Portuguese have still a right to maintain for themselves, is the benefit of the principle that on the high seas the merchantman is equal to the man-of-war. Each may protect itself according to its sense of expediency and necessity, and resist the doing of anything by the other, as a right, which is not a right. If the man-of-war has no right to examine, the merchantman has a right to resist that examination. Even in war, a vessel navigating the ocean may, to a certain extent, draw a line of jurisdiction around itself. This is proved by the restrictions put on the right of scarch. It is said, indeed, that these are the result of treaty stipulations. But they are the result of a true interpretation of the law of nations, and have been recognized in treaties, because England had practically violated the right. A fortiori, in time of peace may every vessel draw a circle of jurisdiction around itself, and resist the exercise of that search and visitation which is not lawful in time of peace. It is upon this ground that Sir W. Scott held the doctrine, that if a neutral resist search, not knowing of the existence of a war, it is no ground of condemnation;[5] and that still more recently he has determined *that the [*33 right of visitation and search does not exist, and cannot be exercised in time of peace.[1] Every ship navigating the ocean in time of peace may appropriate to her temporary use so much of it as is necessary to her protection, consulting the equal rights of others. It is a right that will lie dormant, and never be exercised except upon real apprehension. When there is no apprehension of danger, the consent to approach will never be withheld. But the right to approach in invitum can never exist; and, both parties being independent and equal, each party is to judge for himself as to the extent and reality of that danger. Unless this exclusive right of judgment is maintained, the approach of pirates could never be prevented, who frequently assume the flag of public ships, and fall upon their victims under this disguise.

The learned counsel here argued upon the evidence to show that upon a just application of these principles, the conduct of the Marianna Flora was perfectly justifiable. The first fault was committed by the Alligator in chasing, and not affirming her flag with a gun. This is the law of nations, and recognized as such by every maritime nation on the continent of Europe. The language of Azuni on this subject is peculiarly appropriate to the present case. He says "the fear of meeting with a pirate, and being the dupe of deceitful appearances, 34*] is the reason why *no credit is given to the flag of a vessel, though a ship of war."[2] Had the flag been affirmed, in this instance, in the manner to which the Portuguese are accustomed, they would not have resisted the attempt to approach their vessel, and all the present consequences would have been avoided.

They might also have been avoided, by that deliberate and impartial examination which it was Captain Stockton's duty to make, before he decided on sending in the ship for adjudication. It would have been his duty, even in war, to examine faithfully the ship's papers, and pay due respect to the evidence produced.[3] But it is said that the usual documentary evidence would prove nothing, since it was not a question of proprietary interest or neutral character. The answer is, that the ship's papers would have shown that the vessel, whom he treated as a pirate, was an innocent merchantman; and that the cargo was not liable, by the act, to confiscation, even if the vessel had been guilty of a piratical aggression. The 4th section of the act only subjects the vessel or boat to confiscation, and even that must be understood with the implication that they are the property of the wrongdoers; for the master can never be considered as the owner even of the ship, so as to subject it to forfeiture for his criminal acts, much less can he be considered as the owner of the cargo for such a pur- 35*] pose. *In the words of this court, it may be said that "however general and comprehensive the phrases used in our municipal laws may be, they must always be restricted in construction to places and persons upon whom the legislature has authority and jurisdiction."[4]

Nor can it be maintained that here was an act of private unauthorized war committed by the Portuguese, which, being a violation of the law of nations, would subject the vessel, if taken in delicto, to confiscation. Private war never gives the right of capture and confiscation.[5] That belongs to public war alone. In time of war, every violation of belligerent rights is followed by condemnation, because it is considered as evidence of enemy's property, which, by the laws of war, is transferred to the capturing power. But in time of peace, to make every violation of the law of nations, however slight, produce the condemnation of property, however valuable, and belonging to innocent persons, would reduce the law of nations to the sweeping severity of Draco's code.

In this case, the sending in for adjudication has been sought to be justified by hypothetical reasoning, grounded upon the supposition that lives might have been lost; and a learned discussion of the municipal law of homicide was entered into, to show that if any of the Alligator's crew *had been killed, it would [*36 have been murder; and then it is asked, whether it would not have been Captain Stockton's duty to send it for trial, for what would have been clearly piracy. But we are to deal with the case as we find it. No lives were, in fact, lost; no injury done to the vessel. It was nothing but the offense of firing and in self-defense, against a vessel that turned out to be a public ship of war, but which did not at first manifest her character in the mode to which the Portuguese had been accustomed. Was it possible to suppose that such an act could produce the confiscation of the cargo belonging to innocent owners, or of the ship, the owner of which was equally innocent? It was at most a marine trespass, cognizable in the courts of the offender, because it was not a case of war, nor to be determined by the law of war; or if there were a doubt whether there was anything of national insult in it, it might be a fit subject to be represented to this government for diplomatic discussion. But, after the ship and cargo were brought in, and it was ascertained that she could not be subjected to confiscation, why were they detained and proceeded against as if captured jure belli? Here are a series of wrongs, for which they who suffer damage must look for compensation to him whom the law considers as the wrong-doer, although many of them were the acts of his agents, and done in his absence. They do not seek vindictive damages, but simple compensation only.

The long list of cases which *has been [*37 arrayed against us cannot furnish a rule for a seizure, which was not made jure belli, but which (if to be justified at all) must be considered as having been made in execution of a municipal statute. Will probable cause, even if it existed, furnish a defense in such a case? That is not the law of Hoyt v. Gelston,[6] which was a seizure under an act of Congress, and where there was probable cause, though it was not certified by the court according to the statute. Is it the law of any case where the wrong-doer acts under municipal laws on his own responsibility? Is it the law to be collected from the cases of The Acteon,[7] of Murray v.

The Charming Betsy,[1] of Little v. Bareme,[2] of The Jeune Eugenie,[3] or even of The Louis?[4] In the last case, indeed, damages were refused, because it was primæ impressionis—a case of some doubt and difficulty as to the new construction of the law of nations, and the application of the French decree respecting the slave trade, and the parties seeking damages were stained with crime. But here the law is old, and well settled; and nothing but the offense is of novel impression. The parties are innocent; and the very novelty of the offense ought more certainly to secure its punishment.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of 38*] the *court, and after stating the pleadings, proceeded as follows:

An objection, which is preliminary in its nature, has been taken to the admissibility of this new count to be libel, filed in the Circuit Court, upon the ground that the original subject-matter was exclusively cognizable in the District Court; and to allow this amendment would be to institute an original, and not an appellate inquiry in the Circuit Court. But the objection itself is founded on a mistaken view of the rights and authorities of appellate courts of admiralty. It is the common usage and admitted doctrine of such courts, to permit the parties, upon the appeal, to introduce new allegations, and new proofs, non allegata allegare, et non probata probare. The courts of the United States, in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in admiralty causes, are, by law, authorized to proceed according to the course of proceedings in admiralty courts. It has been the constant habit of the circuit courts to allow amendments of this nature in cases where public justice, and the substantial merits, required them; and this practice has not only been incidentally sanctioned in this court; but on various occasions in the exercise of its own final appellate jurisdiction, it has remanded causes to the Circuit Court, with directions to allow new counts to be filed. We may, then, dismiss any farther discussion of this objection, and proceed to the main questions in controversy. [Here the learned judge recapitulated 39*] *the facts of the case as they have been before stated.]

In considering the circumstances, the court has no difficulty in deciding that this is not a case of a piratical aggression, in the sense of the act of Congress. The Portuguese ship, though armed, was so for a purely defensive mercantile purpose. She was bound homewards with a valuable cargo on board, and could have no motive to engage in any piratical act or enterprise. It is true, that she made a meditated, and, in a sense, a hostile attack, upon the Alligator, with the avowed intention of repelling her approach, or of crippling or destroying her. But there is no reason to doubt that this attack was not made with a piratical or felonious intent, or for the purpose of wanton plunder, or malicious destruction of property. It was done upon a mistake of the facts, under the notion of just self-defense, against what the master very imprudently deemed a piratical cruiser. The combat was, therefore, a combat on mutual misapprehension; and it ended without any of those calamitous consequences to life which might have brought very painful considerations before the court.

It has, indeed, been argued at the bar, that even if this attack had been a piratical aggression it would not have justified the capture and sending in of the ship for adjudication, because foreign ships are not to be governed by our municipal regulations. But the act of Congress is decisive on this subject. It not only authorizes a capture, but a condemnation in our courts, for *such aggressions; and [*40 whatever may be the responsibility incurred by the nation to foreign powers, in executing such laws, there can be no doubt that courts of justice are bound to obey and administer them.

The other count, which seeks condemnation on the ground of an asserted hostile aggression, admits of a similar answer. It proceeds upon the principle that, for gross violations of the law of nations on the high seas, the penalty of confiscation may be properly inflicted upon the offending property. Supposing the general rule to be so in ordinary cases of property taken in delicto, it is not, therefore, to be admitted that every offense, however small, however done under a mistake of rights, or for purposes wholly defensive, is to be visited with such harsh punishments. Whatever may be the case, where a gross, fraudulent and unprovoked attack is made by one vessel upon another upon the sea, which is attended with grievous loss or injury, such effects are not to be attributed to lighter faults, or common negligence. It may be just, in such cases, to award to the injured party full compensation for his actual loss and damage; but the infliction of any forfeiture beyond this does not seem to be pressed by any considerations derived from public law.

Pirates may, without doubt, be lawfully captured on the ocean by the public or private ships of every nation; for they are, in truth, the common enemies of all mankind, and, as such, are liable to the extreme rights of war. And a piratical *aggression by an armed [*41 vessel sailing under the regular flag of any nation, may be justly subjected to the penalty of confiscation for such a gross breach of the law of nations. But every hostile attack, in a time of peace, is not necessarily piratical. It may be by mistake, or in necessary self-defense, or to repel a supposed meditated attack by pirates. It may be justifiable, and then no blame attaches to the act; or it may be without just excuse, and then it carries responsibility in damages. If it proceed farther, if it be an attack from revenge and malignity, from gross abuse of power, and a settled purpose of mischief, it then assumes the character of a private unauthorized war, and may be punished by all the penalties which the law of nations can properly administer.

These latter ingredients are entirely wanting in the case before us; and, therefore, if the question of forfeiture were now in judgment, we should have no doubt, either upon the act of Congress, or the general law, that it ought not to be enforced.

But in the present posture of this cause, the libelants are no longer plaintiffs. The claimants interpose for damages in their turn, and have assumed the character of actors. They contend that they are entitled to damages, first, because the conduct of Lieutenant Stockton, in the approach and seizure of the Marianna Flora, was unjustifiable; and second, because, at all events, the subsequent sending her in for adjudication was without any reasonable cause.

42*] *In considering these points, it is necessary to ascertain what are the rights and duties of armed, and other ships, navigating the ocean in time of peace. It is admitted that the right of visitation and search does not, under such circumstances, belong to the public ships of any nation. This right is strictly a belligerent right, allowed by the general consent of nations in time of war, and limited to those occasions. It is true that it has been held in the courts of this country, that American ships, offending against our laws, and foreign ships, in like manner, offending within our jurisdiction, may, afterwards, be pursued and seized upon the ocean, and rightfully brought into our ports for adjudication. This, however, has never been supposed to draw after it any right of visitation or search. The party, in such case, seizes at his peril. If he establishes the forfeiture, he is justified. If he fails, he must make full compensation in damages.

Upon the ocean, then, in time of peace, all possess an entire equality. It is the common highway of all, appropriated to the use of all; and no one can vindicate to himself a superior or exclusive prerogative there. Every ship sails there with the unquestionable right of pursuing her own lawful business without interruption; but, whatever may be that business, she is bound to pursue it in such a manner as not to violate the rights of others. The general maxim in such cases is, sic utere tuo, ut non alienum lædas.

It has been argued that no ship has a right 43*] to *approach another at sea; and that every ship has a right to draw round her a line of jurisdiction, within which no other is at liberty to intrude. In short, that she may appropriate so much of the ocean as she may deem necessary for her protection, and prevent any nearer approach.

This doctrine appears to us novel, and is not supported by any authority. It goes to establish upon the ocean a territorial jurisdiction, like that which is claimed by all nations within cannon-shot of their shores, in virtue of their general sovereignty. But the latter right is founded upon the principle of sovereign and permanent appropriation, and has never been successfully asserted beyond it. Every vessel undoubtedly has a right to the use of so much of the ocean as she occupies, and as is essential to her own movements. Beyond this, no exclusive right has ever yet been recognized, and we see no reason for admitting its existence. Merchant ships are in the constant habit of approaching each other on the ocean, either to relieve their own distress, to procure information, or to ascertain the character of strangers; and, hitherto, there has never been supposed in such conduct any breach of the customary observances, or of the strictest principles of the law of nations. In respect to ships of war sailing, as in the present case, under the authority of their government, to arrest pirates, and other public offenders, there is no reason why they may not approach any vessels descried at sea, for the purpose of ascertaining their real characters. Such a right seems *indispensable for [*44 the fair and discreet exercise of their authority; and the use of it cannot be justly deemed indicative of any design to insult or injure those they approach or to impede them in their lawful commerce. On the other hand, it is clear, that no ship is, under such circumstances, bound to lie by, or wait the approach of any other ship. She is at full liberty to pursue her voyage in her own way, and to use all necessary precautions to avoid any suspected sinister enterprise or hostile attack. She has a right to consult her own safety; but, at the same time, she must take care not to violate the rights of others. She may use any precautions dictated by the prudence or fears of her officers; either as to delay, or the progress or course of her voyage; but she is not at liberty to inflict injuries upon other innocent parties, simply because of conjectural dangers. These principles seem to us the natural result of the common duties and rights of nations navigating the ocean in time of peace. Such a state of things carries with it very different obligations and responsibilities from those which belong to public war, and is not to be confounded with it.

The first inquiry, then, is, whether the conduct of Lieutenant Stockton was, under all the circumstances preceding and attending the combat, justifiable. There is no pretense to say that he committed the first aggression. That, beyond all question, was on the part of the Marianna Flora; and her firing was persisted in after the Alligator had hoisted her national flag, and, of *course, held out a signal of her [45 real pacific character. What, then, is the excuse for this hostile attack? Was it occasioned by any default or misconduct on the part of the Alligator? It is said that the Alligator had no right to approach the Marianna Flora, and that the mere fact of approach authorized the attack. This is what the court feels itself bound to deny. Lieutenant Stockton, with a view to the objects of his cruise, had just as unquestionable a right to use the ocean as the Portuguese ship had, and his right of approach was just as perfect as her right of flight. But, in point of fact, Lieutenant Stockton's approach was not from mere motives of public service, but was occasioned by the acts of the Marianna Flora. He was steering on a course which must, in a short time, have carried him far away from her. She lay to, and showed a signal ordinarily indicative of distress. It was so understood, and, from motives of humanity, the course was changed, in order to afford the necessary relief. There is not a pretense in the whole evidence that the lying to was not voluntary, and was not an invitation of some sort. The whole reasoning on the part of the claimants is, that it was for the purpose of meeting a supposed enemy by daylight, and, in this way, to avoid the difficulties of an engagement in the night. But how was this to be known on board of the Alligator? How was it to be known that she was a Portuguese ship, or that she took the Alligator for a pirate, or that her object in laying to was a defensive operation? When the 46] vessels were within reach of each other, the first salutation from the ship was a shot fired ahead, and, at the same time, no national flag appeared at the mast-head. The ship was armed, appeared full of men, and, from her manœuvres, almost necessarily led to the supposition that her previous conduct was a decoy, and that she was either a piratical vessel, or, at least, in possession of pirates. Under such circumstances, with hostilities already proclaimed, Lieutenant Stockton was certainly not bound to retreat; and, upon his advance, other guns, loaded with shot, were fired, for the express purpose of destruction. It was, then, a case of open, meditated hostility, and this, to, without any national flag displayed by the Portuguese ship, which might tend to correct the error, for she never hoisted her flag until the surrender. What, then, was Lieutenant Stockton's duty? In our view it was plain; it was to oppose force to force; to attack and to subdue the vessel thus prosecuting unauthorized warfare upon his schooner and crew. In taking, therefore, the readiest means to accomplish the object, he acted, in our opinion, with entire legal propriety. He was not bound to fly, or to wait until he was crippled. His was not a case of mere remote danger, but of imminent, pressing and present danger. He had the flag of his country to maintain, and the rights of his cruiser to vindicate. To have hesitated in what his duty to his government called for on such an occasion, would have been to betray (what 47] no honorable *officer could be supposed to indulge) an indifference to its dignity and sovereignty.

But it is argued that Lieutenant Stockton was bound to have affirmed his national flag by an appropriate gun; that this is a customary observance at sea, and is universally understood as indispensable to prevent mistakes and misadventures; and that the omission was such a default on his part, as places him in delicto as to all the subsequent transactions. This imputation certainly comes with no extraordinary grace from the party by whom it is now asserted. If such an observance be usual and necessary, why was it not complied with on the part of the Marianna Flora? Her commander asserts that by the laws of his own country, as well as those of France and Spain, this is a known and positive obligation on all armed vessels, which they are not at liberty to disregard. Upon what ground, then, can he claim an exemption from performing it? Upon what ground can be set up as a default in another, that which he has wholly omitted to do on his own part? His own duty was clear, and pointed out; and yet he makes that a matter of complaint against the other side, which was confessedly a primary default in himself. He not only did not hoist or affirm his flag in the first instance, but repeatedly fired at his adversary with hostile intentions, without exhibiting his own national character at all. He left, therefore, according to his own view of the law, his own duty unperformed, and fortified, as against himself, the very inference that his ship 48*] *might properly be deemed, under such circumstances, a piratical cruiser.

But we are not disposed to admit that there exists any such universal rule or obligation of an affirming gun, as has been suggested at the bar. It may be the law of the maritime states of the European continent already alluded to, founded in their own usages or positive regulations; but it does not hence follow that it is binding upon all other nations. It was admitted, at the argument, that the English practice is otherwise; and surely, as a maritime power, England deserves to be listened to with as much respect, on such a point, as any other nation. It was justly inferred that the practice of America is conformable to that of England; and the absence of any counterproof on the record, is almost of itself decisive. Such, however, as the practice is, even among the continental nations of Europe, it is a practice adopted with reference to a state of war, rather than peace. It may be a useful precaution to prevent conflicts between neutrals, and allies, and belligerents, and even between armed ships of the same nation. But the very necessity of the precaution in time of war arises from circumstances which do not ordinarily occur in time of general peace. Assuming, therefore, that the ceremony might be salutary and proper in periods of war, and suitable to its exigencies, it by no means follows that it is justly to be insisted on at the peril of costs and damages in peace. In any view, therefore, we do not think this omission can avail the claimants.

eral obligation upon armed ships, in exercising the right of visitation and search, to keep at a distance, out of cannon-shot, and to demean themselves in such a manner as not to endanger neutrals. And this objection, it is added, has been specially provided for, and enforced by the stipulations of many of our own treaties with foreign powers. It might be a decisive answer to this argument, that here no right of visitation and search was attempted to be exercised. Lieutenant Stockton did not claim to be a belligerent, entitled to search neutrals on the ocean. His commission was for other objects. He did not approach or subdue the Marianna Flora, in order to compel her to submit to his search, but with other motives. He took possession of her, not because she resisted the right of search, but because she attacked him in a hostile manner, without any reasonable cause or provocation.

Doubtless, the obligation of treaties is to be observed with entire good faith and scrupulous care. But stipulations in treaties having sole reference to the exercise of the rights of belligerents in time of war, cannot, upon any reasonable principles of construction, be applied to govern cases exclusively of another nature, and belonging to a state of peace. Another consideration, quite sufficient to establish that such stipulations cannot be applied in aid of the present case, is, that whatever may be our duties to other nations, we have no such treaty subsisting with *Portugal. It will scarce- [*50 ly be pretended that we are bound to Portugal by stipulations to which she is no party, and by which she incurs no correspondent obligation.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the conduct of Lieutenant Stockton, in approaching, and, ultimately, in subduing the Marianna Flora, was entirely justifiable. The first wrong was done by her, and his own subsequent acts were a just defense and vindication of the rights and honor of his country.

The next inquiry is, whether the act of sending in the Marianna Flora for adjudication, was, under all the circumstances, unjustifiable, so as to carry with it responsibility in damages.

It is argued that, upon examination of the ship's papers, the crew, and the cargo, it must clearly have appeared that the ship was a merchant ship bound on a lawful voyage, and not a piratical cruiser. This state of the case must be admitted to have been apparent. But the real difficulty is of another sort. Her papers, and cargo, and destination, could give no information of the nature of the attack made upon the Alligator. However hostile, malignant, or even piratical the aggression might be, the papers could shed no light upon the subject. The owners of the cargo, and the owners of the ship (so far at least as their duties and responsibilities were not bound up by the acts of the master, as their agent), might be innocent; the voyage might be of a purely mercantile character, and yet, acts of [*51 aggression might be committed, *which might bring the case completely within the act of Congress, or of the general law of nations, as a gross and violent injury, calling for ample redress. The real duty imposed upon Lieutenant Stockton was, not to examine the papers, unless so far as they might explain doubtful circumstances, but to ascertain the nature, object and intent of the attack upon his vessel. He was bound to exercise an honest and fair discretion on the subject, and to obtain such explanations as might guide his judgment. What was the excuse offered for the attack upon him? It was not that the guns were fired by mistake or accident. They were admitted to have been by authority and design. They were fired after his own flag was displayed, and with the express intention of disabling the vessel and destroying the crew. The only excuse offered for this unjustifiable act was, that the commander entertained a fear that the Alligator was a pirate. But such a fear, unauthorized by any acts on the other side, was no excuse for a wrong which might have led to the most fatal consequences. If the Alligator had been seriously injured, or any of her crew had been killed, no doubt could exist that, under such circumstances, the ship ought to have been sent in for adjudication, to enforce redress, and also to administer, if necessary, punishment. The attack was not the less inexcusable because the consequences were not as injurious as the master intended.

It is a different thing to sit in judgment upon this case, after full legal investigations, [52* aided by *the regular evidence of all parties, and to draw conclusions at sea, with very imperfect means of ascertaining facts and principles, which ought to direct the judgment. It would be a harsh judgment to declare that an officer charged with high and responsible duties on the part of his government, should exercise the discretion intrusted to him at the peril of damages, because a court of law might ultimately decide that he might well have exercised that discretion another way. If Lieutenant Stockton had acted with gross negligence or malignity, and with a wanton abuse of power, there might be strong grounds on which to rest this claim of damages. But it is conceded on all sides, and in this opinion the court concurs, that he acted with honorable motives, and from a sense of duty to his government. He thought the aggression was piratical, and that it was an indignity to the national flag, utterly inexcusable. The view now taken by this court, in respect to the whole case, upon a full examination of all the facts, is certainly somewhat different. It leads us to say that Lieutenant Stockton might, without justly incurring the displeasure of his government, have released the ship, not because she had done no wrong, but because the wrong was not of such a nature as called for vindictive redress.

But, the question upon which damages must depend, is not whether he might not have released the ship, but whether he was, at all events, bound so to do; and whether that obligation *was so imperative that the omis- [*53 sion ought to be visited with damages.

We are, then, to consider the real difficulties of Lieutenant Stockton's situation. An attack had been made upon a national ship under his command without cause. It was a hostile act, an indignity to the nation, and a trespass upon its rights and sovereignty. It was not an accidental, but a meditated act; not necessarily carrying its own excuse along with it, but susceptible of different interpretations. It was not an affair in which he was at liberty to consult his own wishes or honor merely, although a brave and distinguished officer might naturally feel some solicitude to preserve his high reputation untarnished in the eyes of his government. He was bound to look to the rights of his country. He might well hesitate in assuming the arbitration of national wrongs. He might well feel a scrupulous delicacy in undertaking to waive any claim which the government had authority to enforce, or to defeat any redress which it might choose to seek, or to prevent any inquiries which, through its established tribunals, it might think fit to institute, in respect to his conduct, or that of the offending vessel. Considerations of this nature could not but weigh heavily upon the mind of a gallant officer; and they are not unfit to be entertained by this court in forming its own judgment.

It is, also, farther to be observed, that the case was confessedly new in its character and circumstances. The researches of counsel throughout *the progress of this pro- [*54 tracted controversy have not discovered any case which, in point of law, can govern this. If it is new here, it may well be deemed to have been new and embarrassing to Lieutenant Stockton. In such a case, it is not matter of surprise that he should come to the conclusion that it was not proper to take upon himself the responsibility of a final decision; but to confide the honor of the nation, as well as the rights of the other party, to judicial decision. No inference is attempted to be drawn that his acts were intentionally oppressive and harsh; and it would be going a great way to declare that an exercise of honest discretion, in a case of wrong on the other side, ought to draw after it the penalty of damages.

There is another more general consideration

difficulty of the said M'Cullough in procuring security, if not render it impossible for him to procure it; yet, if they shall also be of opinion that the defendant without making any inquiries of the plaintiffs on the subject of such information and intention, or holding any communication with them on the subject of his intended indorsement, did, of his own accord, on the application of the said M'Cullough, and for the purpose of giving effect to the said arrangement, indorse the said note on which this action is brought, that there was nothing in the evidence so given by the defendant, to affect the plaintiff's right of recovery in this action. That, in order to vitiate the said note and indorsement in law, and to bar the plaintiff's right of recovery thereon, on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation, or fraudulent concealment of circumstances known to them and unknown to the defendant, it was incumbent on the defendant to show that he applied to the plaintiffs for information, or held some communication with them for the purpose of receiving such information, and that on such application or communication, the plaintiffs either misrepresented or concealed such circumstances; and that, in the absence of such proof, there was nothing in the facts so given in evidence by the defendant, to affect the right of recovery in the action.

64*] *The court gave the instruction as asked, to which an exception was taken.

The counsel for the defendant then moved the court for instructions, that if the jury should draw from the evidence certain inferences which were stated, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. These inferences were, that the bank was fully informed in March, 1819, of the fraudulent conduct of M'Cullough, the extent of his misapplication of their funds, and of his insolvency; that on receiving this information, they became satisfied of his unfitness to continue in office, and determined to remove him. That, however, they continued him in office until the 18th of May, carefully concealing the circumstances, and their determination, for the purpose of obtaining security of the debt due to them from the said M'Cullough, one of which so contemplated securities was the note in question. That the defendant was, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, ignorant of M'Cullough's breach of duty, and of the determination to remove him, and indorsed the note by reason of that ignorance.

The court refused to give this instruction, unless the jury should be further of opinion that the defendant was led into this state of ignorance in consequence of inquiries made by him of the plaintiffs, or of some previous communication between them and him.

On the farther application of the counsel for the defendant, praying the court to instruct the jury that, on the statement and evidence 65*] contained *in the bills of exception, if the jury believed the same, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, the court refused to give the instruction asked, and directed the jury that on the evidence aforesaid the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the court below, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Webster and Mr. Taney for the plaintiff in error, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Emmett for the defendants in error. The discussion took a wide range upon the doctrine of misrepresentation and concealment in contracts; but as that point was not determined by the court, it has not been thought necessary to report anything more than a concise summary of the arguments of counsel.

The following points were made for the plaintiff in error, upon the instructions given and refused by the court below:

1. That the concealment of the facts and circumstances above mentioned, or the concealment of any one of them, whereby the plaintiff in error was induced to enter into the contract in question, was a fraud upon him, and vitiated the contract.

2. That if the mere omission to communicate the said facts and circumstances would not be a fraud, yet, the act of the defendants in error, of continuing M'Cullough in office, in order to give *him credit, and thereby [*66 to procure the security in question, by which means the plaintiff in error was deceived, and induced to indorse the said note, was a fraud upon him, and vitiated the contract.

3. That the continuance of M'Cullough in the office of cashier, from the 16th of March, 1819 (when his misconduct in office came to the knowledge of the president and directors of the bank), until the 18th of May following, when he was dismissed, was a violation of the duty of the president and directors to the government of the United States, and to the public, and therefore vitiated any contract obtained by means of such continuance in office.

Upon the first point, it was argued that the concealment of material circumstances, known to one party, and unknown to the other, vitiates the contract.[1] In the opinion given by the court below, the principle was admitted, but with this qualification, that it must be on inquiry or communication, for the purpose of information. In this view of the subject, the only question would be, whether the rule is subject to this limitation, i. e., of inquiry or communication for the purpose of information. But an exception to the rule was supposed to exist, and it might be said that a party is not bound to communicate circumstances extrinsic *to the contract, and that the circum- [67 stances concealed were extrinsic. If this proposition were true, although there had been inquiry and communication, yet the facts themselves being of such a character that they need not to have been disclosed, that alone created the exception to the rule. But it was insisted the exception ought to be confined to those facts which are equally open to both parties.[2] The ground upon which Etting undertook for M'Cullough's preformance, was his confidence in his supposed integrity, and in his resources and credit derived from his connection with the bank. No case could be found which states that inquiry is necessary to create the obligation to disclose material facts, which are not equally within the knowledge of both parties. The fraud consists in dealing with the party in ignorance, and leaving him so. It is not necessary that the other party should have created the false impression, or intended to have created it. It is sufficient that he knows it, and takes advantage of it.[1] Undue concealment consists in the suppression of a material fact not in the knowledge of both parties, and not of a nature to be equally known to both parties, in a case where confidence is reposed that the fact does not exist. In Laidlaw v. 68] Organ, *the intelligence was of a nature to be equally known to both parties, and it was not a fact respecting which confidence is generally reposed that it will be disclosed.

On the second point, it was argued that here was an act done in order to give a false credit, and it did give false credit. It was a positive deceit by acts, though not by words. It was asked, whether a party might lawfully deceive in one way, and not in the other. The law is more consistent with common justice, and says you must do nothing to deceive.[2] It was a case of industrious concealment.[3] By continuing the cashier in office, the defendants in error gave him a fictitious credit which they knew did not belong to him. It was analogous to the ordinary case of the fraudulent misrepresentation of the credit of another.[4] It had been said there was no inquiry. Why was there none? Because the very continuance of the officer in office was evidence that they thought him honest. It might, perhaps, be contended that nothing was positively said or done by the bank calculated to mislead the surety. But silence, or an omission to act, may, in many cases, as effectually deceive the party, as the most explicit declaration, or the most positive acts. Continuing the cashier in office was equivalent to a suggestio falsi.[5]

69*] *On the third point, the peculiar character of the bank was insisted on, as an instrument of the government, not created for its own profit merely, but as a means to aid the financial operations of the government.[6] Both the public and the government were deceived and injured by the misplaced confidence of the bank in their cashier. It was their duty to have removed him the instant his default was discovered. It is contrary to the policy of the law to enforce a contract obtained by a breach of duty to the public. The bank may be considered as a public officer, and is bound by the same obligations, and owes the same duties, as any other public officer. But would it be pretended that a public officer could keep an unworthy agent or deputy in office, for *the [*70 mere purpose of securing a debt due to himself?

On the part of the defendants in error, it was stated that the rule is accurately laid down by Mr. Fonblanque, as to what circumstances a contracting party is bound to disclose: "If a man, by the suppression of a truth which he was bound to communicate, or by the wilful suggestion of a falsehood, be the cause of prejudice to another, who had a right to a full and correct representation of the fact, it is certainly agreeable to the dictates of a good conscience, that his claim should be postponed to that of the person whose confidence was induced by his representation."[7] Under certain modifications, and with certain exceptions, the party is bound to communicate all circumstances intrinsic in the contract itself; all those circumstances which enter into the contract as ingredients, and form constituent parts of it. But, with regard to circumstances extrinsic to the contract, though forming inducements to enter into it, however powerfully he may believe and know they are operating with the opposite party, he is at liberty to keep silence. Intrinsic circumstances are such, for example, as regard the quality and price of the article, which must, of necessity, enter into the inducements. Extrinsic circumstances are those considerations which form no component part of the contract itself, but which may form inducements with the party to enter into it. The distinction is founded *in reason, [*71 and is necessary to the business of life.[8] With regard to the whole class of extrinsic circumstances, though, if the party undertake to disclose them, he must take care to state the truth, yet, he may maintain the most obstinate silence respecting them, and the contract will still be valid.

As to the objection that the rule must be received with the qualification, that the facts are equally accessible to both parties, it was said that if by this was meant that they must be equally accessible to both by the use of ordinary diligence, it could not be considered as well founded.[9] And if it meant nothing more than that it was physically accessible, where the party pushes his inquiries in all possible directions, and takes sufficient time to make the discovery, then it was inapplicable to any practical purpose in the business of life. "A clerk to the Fishmongers' Company had incurred a considerable debt. The deficit had been increasing from year to year, and was at length carried beyond what the company were likely to recover. They demanded additional security, which he procured. The case had come before him only upon motion, but he had thought a good deal upon it, and the light in which it appeared to him was this: If he knew himself to be cheated by an agent, and, concealing that fact, applied for security, in such a manner, and under such circumstances, as held him out to others as one whom he considered as a trustworthy person, and anyone acting under the impression that the agent was so considered by his employer, had become bound for him, it appeared to him that he could not conscientiously hold that security. He was, then, of opinion that the Fishmongers' Company could not hold their security. He did not know what had become of the case afterwards, but he believed that his opinion was submitted to, and that no further proceedings were had. He had since reconsidered the matter, and still retained his former opinion, and would act upon it judicially, if occasion offered."

difficulty of the said M'Cullough in procuring security, if not render it impossible for him to procure it; yet, if they shall also be of opinion that the defendant without making any inquiries of the plaintiffs on the subject of such information and intention, or holding any communication with them on the subject of his intended indorsement, did, of his own accord, on the application of the said M'Cullough, and for the purpose of giving effect to the said arrangement, indorse the said note on which this action is brought, that there was nothing in the evidence so given by the defendant, to affect the plaintiff's right of recovery in this action. That, in order to vitiate the said note and indorsement in law, and to bar the plaintiff's right of recovery thereon, on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation, or fraudulent concealment of circumstances known to them and unknown to the defendant, it was incumbent on the defendant to show that he applied to the plaintiffs for information, or held some communication with them for the purpose of receiving such information, and that on such application or communication, the plaintiffs either misrepresented or concealed such circumstances; and that, in the absence of such proof, there was nothing in the facts so given in evidence by the defendant, to affect the right of recovery in the action.

64*] *The court gave the instruction as asked, to which an exception was taken.

The counsel for the defendant then moved the court for instructions, that if the jury should draw from the evidence certain inferences which were stated, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. These inferences were, that the bank was fully informed in March, 1819, of the fraudulent conduct of M'Cullough, the extent of his misapplication of their funds, and of his insolvency; that on receiving this information, they became satisfied of his unfitness to continue in office, and determined to remove him. That, however, they continued him in office until the 18th of May, carefully concealing the circumstances, and their determination, for the purpose of obtaining security of the debt due to them from the said M'Cullough, one of which so contemplated securities was the note in question. That the defendant was, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, ignorant of M'Cullough's breach of duty, and of the determination to remove him, and indorsed the note by reason of that ignorance.

The court refused to give this instruction, unless the jury should be further of opinion that the defendant was led into this state of ignorance in consequence of inquiries made by him of the plaintiffs, or of some previous communication between them and him.

On the farther application of the counsel for the defendant, praying the court to instruct the jury that, on the statement and evidence 65*] contained *in the bills of exception, if the jury believed the same, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, the court refused to give the instruction asked, and directed the jury that on the evidence aforesaid the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the court below, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Webster and Mr. Taney for the plaintiff in error, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Emmett for the defendants in error. The discussion took a wide range upon the doctrine of misrepresentation and concealment in contracts; but as that point was not determined by the court, it has not been thought necessary to report anything more than a concise summary of the arguments of counsel.

The following points were made for the plaintiff in error, upon the instructions given and refused by the court below:

1. That the concealment of the facts and circumstances above mentioned, or the concealment of any one of them, whereby the plaintiff in error was induced to enter into the contract in question, was a fraud upon him, and vitiated the contract.

2. That if the mere omission to communicate the said facts and circumstances would not be a fraud, yet, the act of the defendants in error, of continuing M'Cullough in office, in order to give *him credit, and thereby [*66 to procure the security in question, by which means the plaintiff in error was deceived, and induced to indorse the said note, was a fraud upon him, and vitiated the contract.

3. That the continuance of M'Cullough in the office of cashier, from the 16th of March, 1819 (when his misconduct in office came to the knowledge of the president and directors of the bank), until the 18th of May following, when he was dismissed, was a violation of the duty of the president and directors to the government of the United States, and to the public, and therefore vitiated any contract obtained by means of such continuance in office.

Upon the first point, it was argued that the concealment of material circumstances, known to one party, and unknown to the other, vitiates the contract.[1] In the opinion given by the court below, the principle was admitted, but with this qualification, that it must be on inquiry or communication, for the purpose of information. In this view of the subject, the only question would be, whether the rule is subject to this limitation, i. e., of inquiry or communication for the purpose of information. But an exception to the rule was supposed to exist, and it might be said that a party is not bound to communicate circumstances extrinsic *to the contract, and that the circum- [67 stances concealed were extrinsic. If this proposition were true, although there had been inquiry and communication, yet the facts themselves being of such a character that they need not to have been disclosed, that alone created the exception to the rule. But it was insisted the exception ought to be confined to those facts which are equally open to both parties.[2] The ground upon which Etting undertook for M'Cullough's preformance, was his confidence in his supposed integrity, and in his resources and credit derived from his connection with the bank. No case could be found which states that inquiry is necessary to create the obligation to disclose material facts, which are not equally within the knowledge of both parties. The fraud consists in dealing with the party in ignorance, and leaving him so. It is not necessary that the other party should have created the false impression, or intended to have created it. It is sufficient that he knows it, and takes advantage of it.[1] Undue concealment consists in the suppression of a material fact not in the knowledge of both parties, and not of a nature to be equally known to both parties, in a case where confidence is reposed that the fact does not exist. In Laidlaw v. 68] Organ, *the intelligence was of a nature to be equally known to both parties, and it was not a fact respecting which confidence is generally reposed that it will be disclosed.

On the second point, it was argued that here was an act done in order to give a false credit, and it did give false credit. It was a positive deceit by acts, though not by words. It was asked, whether a party might lawfully deceive in one way, and not in the other. The law is more consistent with common justice, and says you must do nothing to deceive.[2] It was a case of industrious concealment.[3] By continuing the cashier in office, the defendants in error gave him a fictitious credit which they knew did not belong to him. It was analogous to the ordinary case of the fraudulent misrepresentation of the credit of another.[4] It had been said there was no inquiry. Why was there none? Because the very continuance of the officer in office was evidence that they thought him honest. It might, perhaps, be contended that nothing was positively said or done by the bank calculated to mislead the surety. But silence, or an omission to act, may, in many cases, as effectually deceive the party, as the most explicit declaration, or the most positive acts. Continuing the cashier in office was equivalent to a suggestio falsi.[5]

69*] *On the third point, the peculiar character of the bank was insisted on, as an instrument of the government, not created for its own profit merely, but as a means to aid the financial operations of the government.[6] Both the public and the government were deceived and injured by the misplaced confidence of the bank in their cashier. It was their duty to have removed him the instant his default was discovered. It is contrary to the policy of the law to enforce a contract obtained by a breach of duty to the public. The bank may be considered as a public officer, and is bound by the same obligations, and owes the same duties, as any other public officer. But would it be pretended that a public officer could keep an unworthy agent or deputy in office, for *the [*70 mere purpose of securing a debt due to himself?

On the part of the defendants in error, it was stated that the rule is accurately laid down by Mr. Fonblanque, as to what circumstances a contracting party is bound to disclose: "If a man, by the suppression of a truth which he was bound to communicate, or by the wilful suggestion of a falsehood, be the cause of prejudice to another, who had a right to a full and correct representation of the fact, it is certainly agreeable to the dictates of a good conscience, that his claim should be postponed to that of the person whose confidence was induced by his representation."[7] Under certain modifications, and with certain exceptions, the party is bound to communicate all circumstances intrinsic in the contract itself; all those circumstances which enter into the contract as ingredients, and form constituent parts of it. But, with regard to circumstances extrinsic to the contract, though forming inducements to enter into it, however powerfully he may believe and know they are operating with the opposite party, he is at liberty to keep silence. Intrinsic circumstances are such, for example, as regard the quality and price of the article, which must, of necessity, enter into the inducements. Extrinsic circumstances are those considerations which form no component part of the contract itself, but which may form inducements with the party to enter into it. The distinction is founded *in reason, [*71 and is necessary to the business of life.[8] With regard to the whole class of extrinsic circumstances, though, if the party undertake to disclose them, he must take care to state the truth, yet, he may maintain the most obstinate silence respecting them, and the contract will still be valid.

As to the objection that the rule must be received with the qualification, that the facts are equally accessible to both parties, it was said that if by this was meant that they must be equally accessible to both by the use of ordinary diligence, it could not be considered as well founded.[9] And if it meant nothing more than that it was physically accessible, where the party pushes his inquiries in all possible directions, and takes sufficient time to make the discovery, then it was inapplicable to any practical purpose in the business of life. qualification had been borrowed from the law with regard to intrinsic circumstances, to which it was properly applied, and transferred to extrinsic circumstances, to which it was wholly inapplicable. Assuming that, with regard to extrinsic circumstances, a party may conceal them without impairing the contract, there was not a feature in any one of the instructions in this case which was not justified by the operation of that principle. The keeping the cashier in office was doing nothing. 72*] It was a mere forbearance to act. All the cases referred to, of industrious concealment, admitted of two answers: (1) That the concealment was of circumstances intrinsic to the contract. (2) That, in all the cases, no acts were done to alter the antecedent state of things for the purpose of concealment. As to the case of Smith v. The Bank of Scotland,[1] which had been relied upon as analogous to the present, it would be found that there was a positive misrepresentation on the part of the bank, they alleging that further security was wanted on account of an increase of business, when, in fact, there was a decrease. Another case from the same book might have been cited, where an attempt was made to set aside a security bond, alleged to have been obtained by unfounded representations of circumstances generally, without any direct reference to the bond, and the court having, according to the forms of the Scottish law, appointed the sureties to say whether they would refer to the respondent's oath, "that he did elicit that bond;" and the sureties having admitted that "they never meant to say that there was any degree of personal influence with either of them to elicit the bond of relief," the Court of Session pronounced in favor of the bond, which was affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal.[2] So, here, it might be asked, whether the plain- 73] tiffs below had done anything to *elicit the note. All that was alleged was, that they had not communicated their intention of removing the cashier, when they were not asked respecting their intentions, and when it was equally lawful for them to retain or to remove him. The effort on the other side is to induce the court to establish a new rule of law, which, however analogous to other principles merely applicable to the contract of insurance, was admitted, even by the ingenious and learned author of the treatise which had been referred to, not to form a part of the jurisprudence of this country.[3]

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

If this case depended on the deservedly high character of the individuals who were engaged on the part of the bank in the transactions in which the suit originated; if elevation above the possibility of suspicion that they could have meditated anything believed by themselves to be legally or morally wrong, could decide it, this cause would not have required the great efforts which have been bestowed upon it. The names which appear on this record can never be connected with actual fraud; nor would any difficulty be found in protecting them from the imputation, were it possible that it could be made. But judicial inquiries are into the rights of the parties; *and although high and honorable charac- [*74 ter has, and ought to have, great influence in weighing testimony in which that character is in any manner involved, yet, when the inferences from that testimony are drawn by others, and a court is required to pronounce the law arising upon them, character is excluded from the view of the judge, and legal principles alone can be acknowledged as his guide.

At the trial several points of law were raised by both parties, on which opinions were given, to which exceptions were taken, and the correctness of those opinions constitutes the single inquiry in this court. [Here the learned Chief Justice stated the case, as it is stated above.]

As preliminary to the inquiry, whether the law arising on the facts, and on the inferences assumed in the bills of exceptions contained in the record, was correctly stated by the court, a point has been made at the bar which must be disposed of. It has been contended that a court is not bound to answer abstract or hypothetical questions of law, not growing out of the testimony in the cause, which may be propounded at the bar; and, to apply this principle, it has been also contended that the testimony contained in the record, and referred to in the bills of exceptions, contains nothing from which the jury could possibly draw those inferences of fact upon which the court was asked to declare the law. That the points made in the bill of exceptions constitute a distinct and totally different case from that made by the evidence.

*That a judge cannot be required to [*75 declare the law on hypothetical questions which do not belong to the cause on trial, has been frequently asserted in this court, and is, we believe, incontrovertible.[4] The court may, at any time, refuse to give an opinion on such a point; and if the party propounding the question is dissatisfied with it, he may except to the refusal, which exception will avail him if he shows that the question was warranted by the testimony, and that the opinion he asked ought to have been given. But, if the judge proceeds to state the law, and states it erroneously, his opinion ought to be revised; and if it can have had any influence on the jury, their verdict ought to be set aside.

It cannot, however, we think, be correctly affirmed with respect to the case now under consideration, that the points stated in the bills of exception have no relation to the testimony to which those bills refer. That testimony consists of various communications and reports made to the bank, of their own transactions, and of the admissions of parties. It has been said that this testimony is all in writing, and is to be construed by the court; and from this proposition is deduced the corollary, that the jury was not at liberty to draw inferences from it.

Were the fact as alleged, and were it true that the testimony is all in writing, the consequence drawn from it cannot be admitted. Conceding it to be the province of the court to construe any particular paper which was offered in 76*] *evidence, the report of the 30th of March for example, and to declare the meaning of every sentence, and of the whole instrument, yet this report contains a great variety of extrinsic circumstances, suggests measures of deep interest, was followed by numerous successive acts which took place in the country, and which do not derive all their influence on the cause from the construction of the particular papers in which they are communicated, but, in a considerable degree, from their connection with each other, from the motives in which they originate, and from the effects they were calculated to produce, and did produce, on others. These subjects are peculiarly proper for the consideration of a jury. If the testimony be examined, it will, we think, appear that the counsel for the plaintiffs has not asked the court to give its opinion on any inferences of fact which it was not at least possible for the jury to draw from the evidence. The knowledge of the bank is not questioned. The ignorance of Etting might be inferred from the absence of all testimony proving his knowledge that any fraud had been practiced by M'Cullough. The original resolution of the bank to remove M'Cullough might be inferred from their knowledge of his unfitness for the office, and from the fact that they did remove him the instant the securities were obtained which they expected from him. The same facts might justify the inference respecting motives which induced the bank to retain him in office until those securities were procured.

We are far from saying that these inferences 77*] were *all of them such as the jury ought to have drawn. It is not difficult to perceive that the bank might have acted on motives equally unexceptionable in morals and in law. The jury might very well have believed that the bank thought the 26,550 shares of stock were not worth more than the sums for which they were pledged, or, at any rate, were not a safe security, and might, therefore, think it advisable to relinquish that pledge, if other security could be substituted in its place. Others might estimate that stock more highly than they did, and might estimate it rightly. Friends, therefore, acting on their own judgment of the value of this stock, might be found willing to indorse the paper of Mr. M'Cullough on receiving it as a pledge. The motive, too, for retaining Mr. M'Cullough in office might be to induce him to do the bank all the justice in his power, not to induce others to indorse his notes. The whole subject was before the jury, and they might have drawn from the testimony either these inferences, or those which are stated in the bills of exceptions. The counsel for the plaintiffs, believing the law to be in their favor, even upon that view of the testimony which is taken in the exceptions, and fearing that the jury, should they take that view, might find for the defendant, chose to refer the law to the court. Whether his fears respecting the jury were well or ill founded, this cause must now be decided on the correctness of the opinion given by the Circuit Court.

In the very elaborate arguments which have 78*] *been made at the bar, several cases have been cited which have been attentively considered. No attempt will be made to analyze them, or to decide on their application to the case before us, because the judges are divided respecting it. Consequently, the principles of law which have been argued, cannot be settled; but the judgment is affirmed, the court being divided in opinion upon it.

Judgment affirmed.

BROOKS v. MARBURY.

A debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another in payment; and it is no objection to the validity of an assignment for that purpose, that it was made by the grantor, and received by the grantee, as trustee, in the hope and expectation, and with a view of preventing prosecution for a felony connected with his transactions with his creditors, if the preferred creditors have done nothing to excite that hope, and the assignment was made without their knowledge or concurrence at the time of its execution, and without a knowledge of the motives which influenced the assignor, or was not afterwards assented to by them under some engagement express or implied to suppress or forbear the prosecution.

An assignment for the benefit of preferred creditors is valid, although their assent is not given at the time of its execution, if they subsequently assent in terms, or by actually receiving the benefit of it.

It is no objection to such an assignment, that it defeats all other creditors of their legal remedies, even if amounting to a majority in number and value, unless there be some express provision of a bankrupt law to invalidate the deed.

*Quære, How far, and under what circum- [*79 stances, the possession of the property assigned to trustees for the benefit of creditors, continuing in the grantor, will invalidate the assignment.

This is the same case which is reported ante, Vol. VII., p. 556. The judgment of the court below was then reversed, and a venire de novo awarded. At the new trial, exceptions were taken to the instructions given by the court to the jury; and the cause having again been brought before this court for revision, was argued by Mr. Jones and Mr. Coxe for the plaintiff,[1] and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Key for the defendant.[2]

How far possession of property by grantor affects assignments.

An absolute bill of sale of chattels is fraudulent

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

This case depends on the validity of a deed executed by Richard H. Fitzhugh on the 31st of December, 1819, purporting to convey to the defendant, for the use of certain enumerated creditors, his slaves, goods and debts, which 80*] deed *was recorded in the record book for the county in which the parties resided, on the 3d of January, 1820. Immediately after executing this deed, the said Fitzhugh absconded; and on the 10th of February, thereafter, the plaintiff sued out an attachment to attach his effects in the hands of the said Marbury. The garnishee denies that he has any effects of the said Fitzhugh in his hands which can be affected by the attachment, the same not being sufficient to satisfy the creditors enumerated in the deed which has been mentioned. The plaintiff contests the validity of that deed. The jury found a verdict in favor of its validity, upon which the Circuit Court rendered a judgment against the plaintiff, which he has brought before this court by a writ of error. In the course of the trial, exceptions were taken by the counsel for the plaintiff to some opinions given by the court, and to its refusal to give others for which they applied. The correctness of the opinions given, and of the refusal of those not given, will now be considered.

On the trial, the garnishee offered to read from the record books of the county, the memorial of the deed which has been mentioned, to which the plaintiff objected, and insisted that the original ought to be produced. The court overruled this objection, and the copy was read. To this opinion of the court the plaintiff's counsel excepted; and he now insists that there is no law of the state of Maryland which directs a deed of the description of that of which a copy was read in this case, to be recorded; and 81*] that, if there *were such a law, still the original ought to be produced, if within the power of the party claiming under it.

The act of 1729, ch. 8, enacts "that from and after the end of this session of assembly, no goods or chattels whereof the vendor, mortgageor or donor shall remain in possession, shall pass, alter or change, or any property thereof be transferred to any purchaser, unless the same be by writing, and acknowledged before one provincial justice of the county where such seller, mortgageor or donor shall reside, and be within twenty days recorded in the records of the same county."

The counsel for the plaintiff insists that this law directs the recording of those deeds only which convey property of which the donor remains in possession, and that the possession in this case must be supposed to have passed with the deed, unless the contrary be shown.

This objection is not without its weight. It, however, does not appear to have been suggested at the trial, and probably did not occur to the court or the parties at the time, or it might have been shown that in point of fact the possession was not immediately changed. Since, however, the admission of the evidence was not made to depend on the circumstance of possession, this objection cannot be overlooked.

It has been also contended by the plaintiff, that if possession did not accompany and follow the deed, it is void as to creditors under the authority *of the case of Hamilton v. [*82 Russel, 1 Cranch's Rep. 310. On this point, it may be proper to observe that in Hamilton v. Russel the deed purported to convey the property to the vendee for his own immediate use, and the subsequent continued possession of the vendor was incompatible with the instrument. This is a deed of trust, not for the benefit of the person to whom it is made, but for the benefit of certain enumerated creditors. The continuance of the possession with the donor until the trust can be executed, may not be so incompatible with the deed as to render it absolutely void under all circumstances. The court does not mean to express any opinion on this point, farther than to say that it is not supposed to be decided in Hamilton v. Russel.

Should the act of 1729 be considered as applying to this case, the question would then arise, whether the copy of a deed be admissible where the original is in the power of the party offering the copy. This would be contrary to the great principle that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of ought to be required. But it has been said, in answer to this objection, that the courts of Maryland have so decided. This court will certainly respect the decisions made in the state; but we are not satisfied that the principle is settled. In the case cited from 6 Harris & Johnson, 234, the question arose on the conclusiveness, not on the admissibility, of the evidence. The suit as to creditors, unless possession accompanies and follows the deed. Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch, 310.

The fact that the grantor retains possession of property which he has conveyed, is not an evidence of fraud, when the conveyance, from its terms, is to leave the possession in the vendor. United States v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 458.

In general, the want of possession constitutes fraud which renders the transaction as to creditors void. But the rule as to possession is not applicable where the possession of the grantor is consistent with the deed, or where the property conveyed is, at the time of the conveyance, abroad and incapable of delivering. In the latter case the title is complete, provided the grantee takes possession within a reasonable time after the property comes within his reach. U. S. v. Hooe, 1 Gall. 419.

How far it is necessary that a change of possession of the property should immediately follow the assignment. See Wheeler v. Sumner, 4 Mas. 183; Bohler v. Cleveland, 5 Mas. 174.

If there is a secert agreement between the parties that the grantor shall enjoy possession for a limited time, for his own benefit, this will render the deed void. Lukins v. Aird, 6 Wall. 78.

Suffering the grantor to remain in possession, is presumptive evidence of fraud. Bank of Orange Co. v. Fink, 7 Paige, 87; Jackson v. Cornell, 1 Sand. Ch. 348; Dewey v. Adams, 4 Edw. 21; Hart v. Crane, 7 Paige, 37; Connah v. Sedgwick, 1 Barb. 210.

Actual removal not necessary, where possession of the property remains in possession of the assignor for the accommodation of the assignee. Vredenburgh v. White, 1 John. Cas. 156; Hitchcock v. St. John, Hoff. 511; Cram v. Mitchell, 1 Sand. Ch. 251.

Suffering the assignor and his clerk to remain in possession of goods in a store, selling at retail, as before the assignment, unexplained, renders assignment void as to creditors. Hart v. Crane, 7 Paige, 37; Adams v. Davidson, 10 N. Y. 309; Pine v. Rikert, 21 Barb. 469; Butler v. Stoddard, 7 Paige, 163; Van Nest v. Yoe, 1 Sand. Ch. 4; Connah v. Sedgwick, 1 Barb. 210; Mead v. was on an administrator's bond, and Mr. Mc-83*] Gruder said, in argument, that *the law requires such a suit to be brought on a copy of the bond. Of course, such copy must be admissible. It is true, that in deciding against its conclusiveness, the court said, generally, that a copy is prima facie evidence in all cases where the law directs an instrument in writing to be recorded. This is the assertion of a general principle, not the construction of a particular act, and we understand that the courts of Maryland have not adhered uniformly to the principle thus laid down. There is some contrariety of opinion on this point; but the majority of the court conceives that the copy should not have been read without showing that the original was not in the power of the party.

Although the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed for error in admitting improper testimony, yet, as the record presents other points which must again arise, and which have been fully argued, this court will proceed to indicate its opinion on those points.

The deed having been admitted, its validity came on to be discussed.

Richard H. Fitzhugh had made notes to a very considerable amount, and had forged the names of indorsers thereon; after which, he had discounted them in the banks of Georgetown, and of this city. The proceeds of the deed were to be applied, in the first instance, to the payment of these forged notes; after which, the residue was for the benefit of the creditors generally. It is understood that there is no residue; and that if the deed be val-84*] id, the debts due to the favored *creditors will be paid to the exclusion of all others; if it be invalid, the whole proceeds must be paid to the attaching creditors in the order in which they stand, to the exclusion of those for whose benefit the deed was made, and of those attaching creditors also for whom nothing shall remain after satisfying prior attachments. It is, then, a mere question of legal preference, unmixed with any equitable considerations whatever.

It is contended by the plaintiff, that the deed is void because the consideration is illegal, it being given for the purpose of suppressing a prosecution for a felony.

The testimony in the cause was abundantly sufficient to justify the jury in drawing the inferences that the deed was executed by Fitzhugh in the hope that payment of the forged notes would enable him to escape a prosecution; and that the same hope was entertained by Marbury. It is not doubted, that had there been any previous communication with the banks which led to this hope, or any evidence that the prosecution was not instituted in consequence of the notes being paid, or that their payment was to depend on a forbearance to prosecute, the deed would have been against the policy of the law, and utterly void. But the evidence stated in the case, and the opinions which were given, as well as those which were refused by the court, present the question whether, assuming the entire innocence of the favored creditors, the deed to Marbury is annulled by any hope which might have lurked in the bosoms of both the grantor and 85*] *grantee, that the payment of the notes it was intended to secure might save Fitzhugh from a prosecution.

This case has once already been before this court, on a writ of error to a judgment of the same Circuit Court, made in favor of the attaching creditor, which judgment was reversed.[1] But, although the facts were the same, the opinions on which the case depended were essentially different from those which are now to be considered. The case wears a new aspect in many respects, and stands on principles which are not absolutely the same. Although any point already determined will not be changed lightly or inconsiderately, yet we think that the decision in the former case does not positively determine this.

The first exception is to an opinion given on the prayer of the defendant. The court instructed the jury "that if they believed, from the evidence, that Richard H. Fitzhugh executed the deed in question, and William Marbury accepted the same, without the concurrence or knowledge of the banks mentioned in the deed; and that the said banks assented to the same without any engagement, express or implied, to suppress or forbear the prosecution of the said Fitzhugh, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover." To this instruction given by the court to the jury, the counsel for the plaintiff excepted.

*The case assumed is, that the deed [*86 was executed "without the concurrence or knowledge of the banks." At the time of its execution, then, they cannot be considered as having in any manner participated in it. The terms exclude any agency whatever on their part in obtaining it. The case proceeds, "and that the said banks assented to the same without any engagement, express or implied, to suppress or forbear the prosecution of the said Fitzhugh." This branch of the statement supposes equal innocence on the part of the banks when the deed was accepted. The case put is, that they had entered into no express or implied engagement to suppress or forbear the prosecution. This certainly left the jury at full liberty to infer an understanding between Marbury and the banks, which is an implied engagement, from the fact that they forebore to prosecute when it was in their power to do so, if such was the fact. It left the jury at full liberty to draw this inference from any language or conduct of the favored creditors, either before or after the deed was accepted, which, in their opinion, would justify it. If, then, the court erred in giving the instruction, that, in such a state of things, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, it is because the belief on the part of Fitzhugh and Marbury, that the payment of the forged notes might save Fitzhugh from a prosecution, although such a belief was unauthorized by those for whose benefit the deed was made, and was not communicated to them, vitiates the conveyance, so that nothing passed by it.

*The general principle, that notice to [87 a trustee, or an agent, is notice to the cestui que trust, or to his employer, is too well settled to be drawn into question. But the case put to the court does not suppose Marbury to be the trustee or agent of the creditors. He is the trustee and agent of Fitzhugh, to perform an act for him which his situation disabled him from performing in person. This act was entirely consistent with law; it was to sell his property, and apply the proceeds to the payment of creditors of a particular description in the first instance, and afterwards, to creditors generally. His right to give the preference is not questioned, nor is the validity of the consideration, so far as it moved from the creditors, infected with any vicious principle, or in any manner brought into doubt. A contract, the consideration of which is the compounding of felony, is admitted to be void; and if this conveyance had been induced by such composition, or the promise of it, or had depended on it, the fact that it was made for the payment of debts justly due would not have secured it from the effect of this contaminating ingredient. But no such ingredient enters into the case. Everything on the part of the creditors, or of any person acting for them, or by their authority, is unexceptionably fair and legal. The plaintiffs rest their claim to set aside this deed on the expectations which Fitzhugh and his agent had formed of its operation on the conduct of the creditors, although the proceedings under the deed were not to be influenced 88] by the success or failure *of their hopes. The case put in this prayer for the instruction of the court, does not, indeed, suppose such expectations; but as it does not exclude them, and as the instruction to the jury is that the plaintiff cannot recover, whatever inferences they may draw from the testimony, not inconsistent with those which the court supposes to decide the cause, it becomes necessary to inquire whether these expectations vitiate the deed.

It cannot be questioned that Fitzhugh might have sold his property, and paid the proceeds to the banks, and that such sale and payment would not have been vitiated by any expectation he had formed that it might save him from a prosecution. Had he communicated this expectation to the purchaser, told him the use he intended to make of the money, and that his motive for preferring the holders of these forged notes to other creditors, was the hope, that on receiving payment, they might be less active in the prosecution, would this have rendered the sale a nullity? We cannot conceive that such a communication would have effected the transaction.

Had Fitzhugh conveyed his property directly to the banks, in trust, to sell it for the payment of these notes in the first instance, so that their right became absolute, without any engagement, express or implied, to suppress or forbear a prosecution, and without any previous or simultaneous communication with them, would the hope cherished in his own mind, that this payment might operate in his 89*] favor with them, avoid the *transaction? We can perceive no reason for giving such an effect to a latent hope which could have no influence on those to whom it was not communicated. If, then, this very transaction, passing directly between Fitzhugh and the banks, would have been legal, why should it be rendered illegal by the agency of Marbury, who was employed by Fitzhugh, and who was impelled by the same motives which influenced his principal? If Fitzhugh might have conveyed directly to the banks, with power to sell for their own benefit, why might he not convey to Marbury, with power to sell, and pay the money to the banks? If a real distinction exists between the cases, we are incapable of perceiving it.

The preference of creditors of a particular description, over others, being one which a debtor has a right to make, the sale of his property, and the payment of the proceeds to such favored creditors, being an act which the debtor may perform by himself or his agent, we cannot conceive that the motives which may have induced the preference, although communicated to the agent, can, in reason, affect the transaction, provided nothing has occurred on the part of the creditors which is in any degree exceptionable, either in law or justice.

It has been said that this deed, as between Fitzhugh and Marbury, is fraudulent, and that no person, however innocent, can take anything under a fraudulent deed.

This proposition is certainly laid down too *broadly. That deeds which are abso- [*90 lutely void cannot be the foundation of title, or that a cestui que trust can claim nothing under a deed which is fraudulently obtained by his trustee, or agent, acting by his authority, need not be controverted; but that a principal and his agent, meditating, as the probable consequence of their act, an object forbidden by the policy of the law, cannot, because the one has conveyed to the other in furtherance of this design, sell to a fair creditor, or for the benefit of a fair creditor, not participating in their views, or cognizant thereof, is more than this court is prepared to say.

The counsel for the plaintiff suppose that this proposition is sustained by the opinion of Chancellor Kent, in Hildreth v. Sands et al. 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 35. Any opinion expressed by that judge is, undoubtedly, entitled to great attention, and will be highly respected by this court. In that case, the chancellor said: "If the deed is admitted to be fraudulent on the part of Comfort Sands, the grantor, there would be difficulty in allowing the deed to stand, even if the grantee was, as he alleges, innocent of the fraud."

This expression of Chancellor Kent must, undoubtedly, be understood in reference to the case in which it was used. He has not said, nor could he mean to say, that in every possible case, a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor would avoid a deed to a bona fide purchaser for a full and valuable consideration, having no knowledge of the fraud. He has only said that if the *particular deed in [*91 that case be admitted to be fraudulent on the part of the grantor, there would be difficulty in allowing it to stand, even if the grantee was ignorant of the fraud. An opinion in a particular case, founded on its special circumstances, is not applicable to cases under circumstances essentially different. In the case in 2 Johns. Ch. a deed from Comfort Sands, to his brother Robert, was declared to be fraudulent and void, because (1) the consideration was inadequate. (2) There was no proof that the consideration was paid or secured. (3) The grantor continued in possession, exercising acts of ownership. (4)

That there were many circumstances attending the execution of the deed, showing that it was not a bona fide sale. The bill had been taken for confessed against the grantor, but the grantee had denied fraud. In this case, the chancellor said that if this deed is admitted to be fraudulent on the part of the grantor, there would be difficulty in allowing it to stand, even if the grantee was innocent. But, in this case, the grantor and grantee were the sole parties. The vice of the deed was in its consideration, in its not being intended or used as a bona fide transfer of other property, and in other circumstances, in all which the grantee necessarily participated. The chancellor did not decree, nor did he think himself justifiable in decreeing, against the grantee, on a bill taken for confessed against the grantor. Yet, this circumstance established the fraud of the grantor as completely as it could be estab-92*] lished by testimony. *Why did he not proceed upon this fact? The reason is, that it would not sustain a decree against the grantee. We think that this declaration has been pressed much farther in argument than the eminent judge who made it would be willing to carry it.

The opinion, that Chancellor Kent intended to confine this observation to the particular case, is strengthened by a reference to the authority on which he relies. He cites Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Vesey's Rep. 273, in which case the Lord Chancellor said: "With regard to the interests of the wife and children of the defendant, there was no personal interference on their part in the transactions that have produced this suit. If, therefore, their estates are to be taken from them, that relief must be given with reference to the conduct of other persons; and I should regret that any doubt could be entertained whether it is not competent to a court of equity to take away from third persons the benefit which they have derived from the fraud, imposition or undue influence of others."

These expressions were used in a case in which Baseley had obtained from Mrs. Huguenin, by means which the court pronounced fraudulent, a settlement of her estate, after her death, upon himself, his wife and children. No consideration moved from the wife and children. They were volunteers claiming under a fraudulent deed, obtained by a husband and a father, acting for their interests as well as his own. In this case, the chancellor said: "He should regret 93*] *that any doubt should be entertained whether it is not competent to a court of equity to take away from third persons the benefit which they have derived from the fraud, imposition or undue influence of others." We should join in that regret. But the distinction between a declaration that a third person, a mere volunteer, claiming under a deed fraudulently obtained by a person acting for his interest, can be reached by a court of equity, though such volunteer had "no personal interference in the transaction," and a declaration that every person claiming under such a deed for a valuable consideration, though entirely untainted by the fraud, and unconnected with those concerned in it, must necessarily lose his property, is too obvious not to be perceived.

The cases cited by the Lord Chancellor, in support of his opinion, which are also referred to in Hildreth v. Sands, are all cases in which the third person affected by the fraud claimed as a volunteer, and was, in some measure, connected with the party practicing the imposition. The mischief which these decisions were intended to reach, was the attempt (to use the language of Lord Chief Justice Wilmot) "to purify the gift, by partitioning and cantoning it out amongst his relations and friends." That a question could exist in such a case, furnishes a very strong argument in favor of the parties claiming under this deed.

The very respectable opinion, then, of Chancellor Kent, does not bear upon this case, nor have we found in the books any decision which *does bear upon it, so as to affect the [*94 creditors who claim under the deed of the 31st of December, 1819. We think, then, there is no error in this first instruction given by the court to the jury.

The counsel for the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury "that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the deed was devised and executed by Fitzhugh, and procured and excepted by Marbury, with the motive and intent, and for the purpose and object, of suppressing a prosecution against said Fitzhugh, by prevailing with the holders of the said forged notes to forebear and forego a prosecution for the said forgeries, that then the said deed is fraudulent and void in law as against the plaintiff."

In discussing the propriety of refusing to give this instruction, it may be proper to observe that there is no error in rejecting a motion of this description, unless it ought to have prevailed in the very terms in which it was made. Nor is a court to be required to give opinions on abstract propositions not supported by any evidence in the cause. The language in which counsel addressed this application to the court, presents different ideas to the mind, and is susceptible of different constructions. The court is required to say that the deed is void if executed by Fitzhugh, and procured and accepted by Marbury, with the intent of suppressing the prosecution, by prevailing with the holders of the said forged notes to forbear and forego a prosecution for the said forgeries. If this was to be the effect of *the deed [*95 itself, unaccompanied by any stipulations which were to be the condition of its application to the purposes for which it professes to be made, then the instruction would have contradicted that previously given, and was properly withheld. But if the counsel is to be understood as praying the court to say that if the deed was to be used by Marbury, as an instrument by which to procure the suppression of the prosecution, that being the condition on which the holders of the forged notes were to entitle themselves to its advantages, it was fraudulent and void as to the plaintiff, there can be no doubt that the instruction ought to have been given, unless the court was satisfied that there was no evidence in the cause to which it could apply.

The second motion is, in substance, that if the jury find, from the whole evidence, that the deed was executed for the intent and purpose afore-mentioned, and that the preferred creditors accepted the agency of the said Marbury, and adopted his act in procuring and accepting said deed, it is competent to the jury to infer a notice, either actual or constructive, to the said preferred creditors, through their said agent, of the illegal consideration, intent and object of the said deed.

This instruction was refused, because there was, in the opinion of the court, no evidence to authorize the conclusions of fact, in the making of which the law was to arise. There was no error in refusing it on this ground. There would have been error had there been testimony 96*] *in the cause to authorize the conclusions of fact assumed. The counsel also moved the court to instruct the jury that if the preferred creditors named in the said deed, or any other creditors of the said Fitzhugh, have not accepted or claimed any benefit under it, and that the same remains the mere act of Marbury and Fitzhugh, without any participation before or after, on the part of the preferred or other creditors of the said Fitzhugh, then the said deed is fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff.

The court refused to give this instruction. In discussing the propriety of this opinion, it becomes necessary to inquire whether the deed remained imperfect, passing nothing in law to Marbury, until it received the assent of the creditors. Upon its face it purports to transfer the property immediately, without any act on the part of the creditors or others. It is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that this is not its legal operation.

It will be very readily conceded that, had the creditors disclaimed the advantages proffered to them in this deed, or looked on as unconcerned spectators while the property was applied by Marbury to the use of Fitzhugh, these, or other circumstances tending to show that the deed was not made in good faith for the purposes expressed in it, would have induced a court of chancery to set it aside, or have justified a court of law in instructing a jury to consider it as fraudulent. But nothing of this sort is alleged. The single inquiry is, whether 97*] the assent of the *creditors be necessary to the completion of the deed. If it be, then the title to the property it purported to convey remained in Fitzhugh until such assent should be given, and might be subjected to this attachment. If the instrument was complete without such assent, then the property passed immediately to Marbury for the purposes of the deed, and did not remain liable to attachment.

Deeds of trust are often made for the benefit of persons who are absent, and even for persons who are not in being. Whether they are for the payment of money, or for any other purpose, no expression of the assent of the persons for whose benefit they are made, has ever been required as preliminary to the vesting of the legal estate in the trustee. Such trusts have always been executed on the idea that the deed was complete when executed by the parties to it. The counsel for the plaintiff could mean no more than to insist that the omission of the creditors to assent to the deed, or claim under it, was such evidence of fraud that the jury ought to find it fraudulent. Let this circumstance be examined.

Real creditors are rarely unwilling to receive their debts from any hand which will pay them. No such unwillingness can be gratuitously ascribed to the holders of forged notes. Unless there be proof to the contrary, the banks must be considered as willing to receive payment from Mr. Marbury, or any other person, from the proceeds of the sales of this property, or from any *other fund. This [*98 deed was executed on the 31st day of January, 1819, and the attachment was sued out on the 10th of February, 1820. Time was required to sell the property, and to collect the proceeds of the sales. It is not alleged in the statement, on which the opinion of the court was prayed, that any notes fell due before the attachments were issued, and remained unpaid. These circumstances do not, we think, afford any ground for the presumption that the deed was fraudulent, so that the property it purported to convey was, on the 10th of February, the property of Fitzhugh, and, consequently, liable to be taken by this attachment.

The counsel for the plaintiff then moved the court to instruct the jury that if the great majority in number and value, of the creditors of the said Fitzhugh, were, by means of said deed, unjustly and purposely hindered, delayed and defeated, in their proper suits and remedies, for the recovery of their said debts, on the absconding of Fitzhugh, and that the deed was executed with the purpose of defeating all legal recourse in behalf of such majority of creditors against the property and effects which said Fitzhugh intended to leave behind, and did leave behind him, then the said deed is fraudulent and void. This instruction also was refused.

The right of a debtor to prefer particular creditors, where no bankrupt or other law prohibiting such preference exists, is not questioned. Yet such preference defeats all other creditors, whether they amount to a majority in number *and value or not. The court [*99 ought not to have left it to the jury to defeat this right, because they might think it unjust. The instruction prayed by the counsel, if given, would have defeated it.

The last prayer of the plaintiff supposes that the deed was obtained for the purpose of being used as the means of suppressing the prosecution; and, farther, that Marbury acted as the agent of the preferred creditors. The refusal of the court to give this instruction must have been founded on the opinion that the question was entirely abstract in its nature. If there was any evidence tending to this conclusion, which ought to have been submitted to the jury, the instruction ought to have been given. But if there was no such evidence, the court could not be required to say, hypothetically, what would be the law had the evidence existed.

This court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in admitting the record of the deed offered in evidence to be read to the jury without any evidence that the original was not in the power of the party offering the copy. The judgment, therefore, is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to the said court, with directions that the verdict be set aside, and a venire facias de novo be awarded.[1]

1.—The general principal that, in the absence of any express provisions of a bankrupt law applicable to the case, a debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another, by actual payment, or a transfer to the creditor himself, or by an assignment in trust, if the creditor be a party to the assignment,

v.

ASA HANDY and CALEB WHEATON, Appellants,
v.
STEPHEN HARDING et al., Respondents.

There must be sufficient equity apparent on the face of the bill to warrant the court in granting the relief prayed; and the material facts on which the plaintiff relies must be so distinctly alleged as to put them in issue.

A court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit brought by heirs-at-law to set aside a conveyance of lands obtained from their ancestor by undue influence, he being so infirm, in body and mind, from old age, and other circumstances, as to be liable to imposition, although his weakness does not amount to insanity.

The same jurisdiction may be exercised where one of the heirs-at-law has, with the consent of the others, taken such a deed, upon an agreement to consider it as a trust for the maintenance of the grantor, and, after his death, for the benefit of his heirs, and the grantee refuses to perform the trust.

Under what circumstances such a conveyance may be allowed to stand as security for actual advances and charges, and set aside for all other purposes.

In such a case, not depending on the absolute insanity of the grantor at the time of executing the conveyance, the court may determine the question of capacity without directing an issue.

The verdict of a jury as to the sanity of the grantor at the time of executing such a conveyance, would not be conclusive, the court being competent to determine for itself the degree of weakness, or of imposition, which will induce it to set aside the instrument.

Exceptions to the report of a master are to be regarded by the court only so far as they are supported by the special statements of the *mas- [*104 ter, or by a distinct reference to the particular portions of testimony on which the party excepting relies. The court does not investigate the items of an account, nor review the whole mass of testimony taken before the master.

Rules of practice in accounting before a master.

In a suit in equity brought by heirs-at-law to set aside a conveyance obtained from their ancestor by fraud and imposition, a final decree for the sale of the property cannot be pronounced, until all the heirs are brought before the court as parties, if they are within the jurisdiction.

If all the heirs cannot be brought before the court, the undivided interest of those who are made parties may be sold.

or subsequently assents thereto, has been settled 100*] in a variety of cases in the different *courts of this country, both state and of the Union. Hatch v. Smith, 5 Mass. Rep. 42; Putnam v. Dutch, 8 Mass. Rep. 287; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. Rep. 144; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. Rep. 339; Thomas v. Goodwin, 12 Mass. Rep. 140; Cushing v. Gore, 15 Mass. Rep. 74; Meeker v. Wilson, 1 Gallis. Rep. 419; Brown v. Minturn, 2 Gallis. Rep. 557; M'Menomy v. Ferrers, 3 Johns. Rep. 72; Wilkes v. Ferris, 5 Johns. Rep. 335; Phœnix v. Ingraham, 5 Johns. Rep. 412; Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 283; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. Rep. 571; Austin v. Bell, 20 Johns. Rep. 442; Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Binn. Rep. 502, 514; Bird v. Smith, 4 Dall. Rep. 85, in note; Lippincott v. Barker, 2 Binn. Rep. 186; Marbury v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. Rep. 556.

The resulting trust, or residuary interest, remaining to the assignor, after the purposes of an assignment for the payment of debts are satisfied, does not avoid the deed, unless it be made mala fide, and for the sake of the resulting trust; nor is such interest liable to execution against the grantor's property. Wilkes v. Ferris, 5 Johns. Rep. 336. But, where an assignment was made in trust, (1) to pay certain preferred creditors; (2) to pay the other creditors of the assignor on condition of their releasing their demands; (3) in case any of them should refuse to release, then in further trust to pay such of the creditors of the assignor as he should appoint. Certain of these creditors refused, obtained judgment, and levied on the property in the hands of the trustees. It was held, that the trust failing as to them, resulted for the benefit of the assignor, and the deed was, therefore, void by the statute of frauds as to the other creditors; and being void in part, was void in the whole. Hyslop v. Clark, 14 Johns. Rep. 458. But an assignment by a debtor, in trust, with a power of revocation, is fraudulent only as regards judgment creditors, or such as are taking measures to recover their debts by suit. Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. Rep. 571, 588. It would therefore seem that an assignment like that in Hyslop v. Clark would be good, if the new appointment were made before any creditor refusing to discharge had obtained a judgment, or brought a suit. It could not, then, be said to be made to "delay, hinder or defraud creditors," according to the language of the statute of frauds of Elizabeth. Thus, where A. on the 23d of March, 1798, assigned property to B, in trust, to pay him, and certain other creditors, *with a power of revocation, and to [*101 appoint new trusts, and, on the 31st of May, 1800, executed an irrevocable deed to B, in trust, having before made several intermediate deeds, all in relation to the same subject, and reserving the same power of revocation; it was determined that the last deed was valid, and might be taken in connection with the first, and no rights of creditors having intervened, the first deed was confirmed by the last. Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. Rep. 571, 588. And it has been held in the state of New York that the deed of assignment may exclude from its benefits such creditors as neglect or refuse to assent to the assignment within a limited time, throwing the distributive shares, to which they would have been entitled, into the general mass, for the benefit of the other creditors provided for by the deed. S. C. Ib. But if the deed, instead of merely excluding the dissenting creditors, and throwing their shares into the general mass, reserves the shares of the dissenting creditors, and directs them to be paid to the grantor himself, the deed of assignment is fraudulent and void. Austin v. Bell, 20 Johns.

NOTE.—Insanity, fraud, etc., in avoidance of a deed in equity.

A person of non-sane memory was formerly held incapable of making a deed. See Shep. Touch. 56; Doe v. Dingnowitty, 4 Sm. & M. Miss. 57; Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484; Den. v. Clark, 2 Ired. N. C. 23.

But according to the modern decisions, a deed executed by a person of non-sane mind, whether insane, imbecile, or an idiot, is voidable rather than void. Miles v. Lingerman, 24 Ind. 387; Wait v. Maxwell, 5 Pick. 217; Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451; Dennett v. Dennett, 44 N. H. 538.

A deed may be avoided on account of drunkenness of the maker. Prentice v. Acorn, 2 Paige, 30; Donelson v. Posey, 13 Ala. 752; Freeman v. Staats, 8 N. J. Eq. 814; See Eaton v. Perry, 29 Mo. 96; Belcher v. Belcher, 10 Yerg. Tenn. 121; Woods v. Pindell, Wright, Ohio, 507; Wamock v. Campbell, 25 N. J. Eq. 485.

A deed may be avoided on the ground of duress but only upon clear and conclusive evidence. Davis v. Fox, 59 Mo. 125; Brown v. Peck, 2 Wis. 261.

The threats must be such as to strike with fear a person of common firmness and constancy of mind; duress by mere advice, direction, influence and persuasion being unknown to the law. Benett v. French, 1 Conn. 354.

A threat to sue is not such duress as will avoid a deed. Harris v. Tyson, 24 Penn. St. 347; See Olivari v. Menger, 39 Tex. 76; Cook v. Moore, 39 Tex. 255; Deputy v. Stapleford, 19 Cal. 303; Baker v. Morton, 12 Wall. 150; See also U. S. v. Child, 12 Wall. 232.

A deed obtained by fraud is void as against the party defrauded. Jackson v. Summerville, 13 Penn. St. 359; Thompson v. Drake, 32 Ala. 99; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231; Gwin v. Hodge, 4 Jones, (N. C.) L. 168; Gage v. Gage, 29 N. H. 533; Montgomery v. Montgomery, 116 Mass. 227;

Sterling Wheaton, alleged that they, with four others not made parties to the suit, together with Caleb Wheaton, one of the defendants, were entitled, as heirs-at-law of Comfort Wheaton, deceased, to the real property mentioned in the bill, and situate in the state of Rhode Island. That Comfort Wheaton, about the year 1802, began to exhibit symptons indicating a loss of intellect, and soon became, from various causes mentioned in the bill, incompetent to the management of his estate, and died in 1810. That, under these circumstances, the defendant, Caleb Wheaton (his son), and who acted as well for himself as in behalf of the plaintiffs, and the defendant Handy (the son-in-law of Comfort Wheaton), entered into an agreement to endeavor to take his estate out of his hands, and to preserve it for the benefit of his heirs-at-law. That it was agreed that Comfort Wheaton should be prevailed on to convey 105*] his real property to *Handy, for a nominal consideration, who should forthwith execute an instrument of writing, declaring that he took and held the same in trust; first, to provide for the decent support of the grantor, during his life; and after a full remuneration for his expenses and trouble in that respect, to hold the residue of the estate for the benefit of the heirs-at-law. That, on the 9th of May, 1805, Handy did procure such conveyance, for the nominal consideration of $2,178, from Comfort Wheaton, and entered upon, possessed and enjoyed the property in question; but that he refused to execute any declaration of trust as he had agreed, but held the property, claiming it as his own. The bill then alleged that the defendant, Caleb Wheaton, after the death of his father, Comfort Wheaton, acting on behalf and for the benefit of the heirs, procured letters of administration of the personal estate of Comfort Wheaton to be issued by the proper court, and caused such further proceedings to be had as that the administrator exposed to sale the real property before mentioned, which had been conveyed to Handy, and that Caleb Wheaton became the purchaser thereof, for the general benefit of the heirs. That various suits at law had resulted from these transactions (and, among others, an ejectment brought by the defendant, Handy, against the defendant, Caleb Wheaton), by which the value of the property had been much deteriorated. The bill then prayed for an account respecting the property; that a decree might be rendered, exonerating it *from the deeds to the de- [*106 fendant, Handy, after satisfying his just claims, and ordering one-fifth part of the real estate to be set-off to the plaintiff, Nancy

Rep. 442. In Massachusetts, it seems that an assignment in trust for such creditors as should, within a certain time, become parties to the deed, and release their demands, is void as against the dissenting creditors. Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. Rep. 146. But see Hastings v. Baldwin, 17 Mass. Rep. 552. In Pennsylvania, the rule to be extracted from the decisions seems to be, that where no definite time is limited, or a period very remote, within which the assent of creditors is to be given, the assignment is considered as fraudulent. But, where a reasonable time is limited, within which the trust property is to vest in those for whom the beneficial interest was intended, it is valid. Whart. Dig. tit. Deed, 1, pl. 70, 76.

In the case of Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. Rep. 571, 588, it was held by the Court of Chancery, and the Court of Errors of New York, that a reservation, in the assignment, of a sum sufficient for the maintenance of the assignor until discharged from his debts, does not invalidate the assignment; though, in case of a deficiency, the creditors are entitled to have the part reserved applied in satisfaction of their debts. But, in the recent case of Mackie v. Cairns, which has not yet been reported, it was determined that such a reservation rendered the conveyance totally void.

As to the question how far the fact of the possession of the property assigned, still continuing 102*] in the grantor, would affect the validity *of the deed, it seems to be generally considered that if the possession of the grantor be consistent with the deed, as when the possession is continued at the request, and for the benefit of the assignees, for their convenience in making the sale, or where the property is at sea, or out of the country, if possession is taken by the trustees within a convenient and reasonable time, the conveyance will be valid. So is a delivery of the receipt of the storekeeper for the goods, it being the regular documentary evidence of the title. Ib.

As to the effect of an assignment for the benefit of creditors (whether under a bankrupt law, or a voluntary private assignment, valid by the lex loci), on property, or the rights of creditors, in another state or country than that where the assignment is made, see Hatch v. Smith, 5 Mass. Rep. 42; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. Rep. 144; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch's Rep. 289; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. Rep. 146; Le Chevalier v. Lynch, Dougl. Rep. 170; Hunter v. Patterson, 2 Harr. & McHenry's Rep. 463; Ward v. Morris, 4 Harr. & M'Henry's Rep. 330. This point was much discussed in the case of Holmes v. Remsen, 4 John's Ch. Rep. 460; S. C. 20 John's Rep. 229, where all the authorities on the subject will be found collected. Even after these very learned and able discussions, it must still be considered as an unsettled question of international law.

Harding, and one-fifth to the plaintiff, Sterling Wheaton, and for general relief.

The answer of the defendant, Handy, denied that Comfort Wheaton was incapable of conveying his property when the deeds of the 9th of May, 1805, were executed; and insisted that his intellect was perfectly sound at that time. It also denied that he, the defendant, purchased as a trustee, and averred that he was a purchaser for a valuable and full consideration. The answer of the other defendant, Caleb Wheaton, admitted the allegations of the bill, and submitted to any decree the court might think equitable.

A great mass of testimony taken in the court below appeared in the record, which was very contradictory as to the capacity of Comfort Wheaton to make the conveyance in question.

The Circuit Court, by its interlocutory decree, directed that the deeds of the 9th of May, 1805, should be set aside, as having been obtained by false impressions made on a mind enfeebled by old age, and various other causes; and that an account of the receipts and disbursements of the defendant, Handy, should be taken, and that he should be credited for all advances made, and charges incurred, for the maintenance of Comfort Wheaton during his life-time, and for repairs and improvements made on the real estate. Exceptions were filed 107*] by both parties to the report, *which was confirmed by the court below. The final decree declared that the real estate conveyed to the defendant, Handy, should stand charged with the amount of the balance of the account due to him; that the same should be sold, and the proceeds brought into court; that the said balance should be paid to him, deducting his proportion of the charges, etc., and the residue, deducting their proportions, etc., should be paid over, and distributed among the heirs-at-law of Comfort Wheaton. If there be any such heirs, not made parties, they to be at liberty to come in under the decree, and receive their shares, paying their proportions of costs and expenses; otherwise to be excluded. That each party before the court should pay his own costs, excepting the fees of the officers of the court, which should be a charge on the property, and borne by the parties according to their respective proportions of interest in the proceeds of the sale.

From this decree both parties appeal.

Mr. Wheaton, for the original plaintiffs, made the following points:

1. That the decree ought to be reversed, so far as it declared that the real property should stand charged with the advances made by the defendant, Handy.

2. That it ought, in all other respects, to be affirmed.

On the first point, he contended, that the deeds having been obtained by the imposition of the grantee on the grantor, the property ought not *to stand charged with the [*108 expenses incurred by the former. That, even supposing him to have held as a trustee during the life-time of the plaintiff's ancestor; after that period he ceased to hold in that capacity, and became a malæ fidei possessor, who was not entitled to be allowed for improvements made on the land.[1]

On the second point, he argued, (1) as to the objection made in the court below, of the defect of jurisdiction in that court, that the words of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 16, providing that suits in equity should not be sustained in the courts of the Union, "in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy, can be had at law," were not intended to abridge the equity jurisdiction of those courts; that it had been frequently determined that the proceedings in those courts were to be according to the English system of equity, both as to principles, practice, and jurisdiction;[2] that fraud and trust were familiar subjects of cognizance in the Court of Chancery; and that equity often interfered to redress fraud, even after a verdict and judgment at law;[1] that this was not a case analogous to that which had been cited in the proceedings below, where the only ground of equitable interference was a 109*] discovery sought to establish the *fraud, and the plaintiff having failed in the discovery, and having a complete remedy at law, should not be allowed to proceed in equity.[2]

2. Another objection was, that this was an attempt to establish a trust by parol evidence, contrary to the statute of frauds. The court below did not consider it necessary to determine this point, because, at all events, there was a resulting trust for the heirs (after allowing for advances, etc.), which, even in England, might, unquestionably, be established by parol. But a comparison of the English statute of frauds, 29 Charles II. c. 3, with the provisions of the local statute of Rhode Island on the same subject, would show that the latter did not extend to trusts, and, therefore, there could be no question of the admissibility of parol evidence in this case.

3. It was a case of imposition practiced by a son-in-law upon his father-in-law, an old man, infirm in body and mind, morally and physically incapable of managing his own affairs, and of resisting the influence and importunities of the other party, standing in that intimate relation. It was analogous to other cases of fraudulent and hard bargains made with expectant heirs, and other persons standing in peculiar relations, rendering them liable to imposition. The great leading case on the general analogy, was that of Chesterfield v. 110*] Jansen,[3] which was not cited *as a direct authority, but as illustrating the general principle. Lord Hardwicke there lays down the rule on which the Court of Chancery proceeds, and classifies the cases in which it will interfere. These are: (1) Actual fraud. (2) Such as is apparent, from the nature of the bargain itself, as being fragrantly unequal. (3) A kind of fraud which may be presumed from the circumstances and condition of the parties contracting. (4) Which may be inferred from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition and deceit on other persons not parties to the fraudulent agreement. (5) Fraud, infecting catching bargains with heirs, reversioners, expectants, etc. There are to be found in the books a great variety of applications of these principles. Thus, in Clarkson v. Hanway,[4] the suit was brought by an heir-at-law to set aside a conveyance by his ancestor, who is described as a "weak man," 72 years old, who had conveyed his estate for a small annuity. The conveyance was set aside on those circumstances alone, by the master of the rolls, and decree confirmed, on appeal, by Lord Macclesfield. In Bates v. Graves,[5] the bill was filed by a son to set aside a conveyance (which was confirmed by a will) by his father to a son-in-law, under circumstances of fraud, and undue practices, upon the weakness of the grantor. Lord Thurlow and Lord Rosslyn concurred in holding these circumstances to be sufficient to annul the conveyance, *though the party was [*111 not a lunatic. In a still more recent case,[6] Lord Eldon relieved against a bargain with an expectant heir, where there was no fraud or imposition, upon the ground of inadequacy of consideration, where there was an inequality of condition in the parties. Mere inadequacy of consideration was held insufficient, but, coupled with the other circumstance, was deemed a sufficient ground to annul the contract. In Huguenin v. Baseley,[7] a settlement by a widow, upon a clergyman and his family, was set aside, as having been obtained by undue influence, and abused confidence in the party, as the agent of the grantor's affairs, upon the principle of public policy and utility, applicable to the analogous cases of guardian and ward, attorney and client, etc. It was there earnestly contended that the law of England does "not prevent a prodigal disposition by a person of sound mind." But the argument was overruled by Lord Eldon; and the words of Sir S. Romilly, arguendo, in that case, are remarkably pertinent to the present: "Though no direct authority is produced, your lordship, dispensing justice by the same rules as your predecessors, upon such a subject, not confined within the narrow limits of precedent, will, as a new relation appears, look into the principles that govern the human heart, and decide accordingly." *The same prin- [*112 ciples and authorities had been applied, by a court of justice of our own country, to a case almost the same with the present in all its material circumstances.[8] They are applied in every system of jurisprudence having a due regard to the protection of the weak from the artifices of those who have the means of unduly influencing or controlling their conduct. Thus, in the countries governed by the Roman law, the provisions of positive law prohibiting donations inter vivos, between persons standing in certain peculiar relations of mutual confidence and dependence, are extended by equity to other relations of a similar character, and falling within the reason of the prohibition.[9] The court below seems to have considered that it might have been justified, on these principles, in declaring the deeds in question utterly void, though, in framing its decree, it thought proper to take a more mitigated view of the defendant's conduct.

Mr. Coxe (with whom was Mr. Webster), for the defendant, Handy, argued: (1) That there was a defect of jurisdiction in the court below, proceeding as a court of equity. A complete and adequate remedy at law existed. If the deeds were invalid on the ground of fraud and imposition, that question might be tried in an *action at law. It had been so tried [*113 and determined.[10]

2. It appeared, on the face of the bill itself, that there were other children of Comfort

Wheaton, who are his heirs-at-law, but who had not been joined in the present suit. They were equally interested with the other plaintiffs, and should, therefore, have been joined. Their interests are also affected by the decree. It is not too late to take advantage of this objection.[1]

3. The bill contained multifarious matters which ought not to be joined. Each of the defendants claimed to have the legal estate in him, in opposition to each other. There was no privity between them as to their respective interests; and before the plaintiffs could have any interest in vacating the deeds of the defendant, Handy, the deed of the defendant, Caleb Wheaton, must be removed. The establishment of their right against one defendant was a prerequisite to their calling upon the other to answer.

4. The main object of the bill, and that attained by the decree, was to enforce specifically a parol agreement alleged to have been made between the two defendants, denied by the defendant, Handy, and not proved by any competent testimony. The contract proved is wholly different from that alleged. Such a 114*] contract as is *alleged, and now attempted to be enforced, is deficient in mutuality.[2] It also virtually admits the sanity and competency of the grantor, Comfort Wheaton, which is now made the ground for setting aside the deeds.

5. If, however, he was in the state of mind in which the bill represents him, the plaintiffs, by their agent, participated in the fraud, and therefore have no right to call upon a court of equity to interfere to relieve them from the web in which they have entangled themselves.[3]

6. The plaintiffs are barred by lapse of time.

7. The decree sanctions an attempt to establish a contract concerning lands, and a trust in real estate, by parol evidence. The proof of a trust lies on the party who alleges it.[4] In this case, the conveyances are absolute on the face of them, and the evidence of a trust is wholly aliunde. To warrant the court in decreeing the execution of a parol declaration of trust, the evidence should be plain and unambiguous.[5] The taking the conveyance was not in part performance. The act of part performance must be such as the party would not have done with any other view than in execution of the alleged agreement.[6] This secret trust, and the allegation of part performance, are both de- 115*] nied by the answer, *and this settles the question.[7] The secret trust cannot be proved by parol testimony, especially where it is made with a stranger to the estate without consideration.[8]

8. The bill does not distinctly allege the incompetency of Comfort Wheaton, and the imposition said to have been practised on him, so as to put these facts in issue. The decree must conform to the allegata. Some substantial ground must be stated. Old age alone is not sufficient.[9]

9. If these facts had been ever so distinctly put in issue, they have not been proved. Where fraud is alleged, it must be fully proved, and will not be presumed.[10] The presumption of law is in favor of a party executing an instrument.[11] The question is confined to the state of mind at the time of executing the instrument.[12] Two witnesses deposing sanæ menti, are to be credited before a hundred proving insanity.[13] The law will not measure a man's understanding, and a partial diminution of intellect is not sufficient to invalidate the deeds; nor is there any such thing as an equitable incapacity, where there is a *legal capac- [*116 ity.[14] Fraud of this description is equally cognizable at law, and in equity; and the Court of Chancery will not set aside a will of lands on that ground, without directing an issue.[15]

10. The decree is inconsistent both with the allegations in the bill, and with itself. It is a bill with a double aspect. It charges incompetency in the grantor, and prays that the estate may be exonerated; it also charges a trust, and prays an account, and general relief. The decree declares that the grantor was incompetent, and his conveyance invalid, and yet does not exonerate the estate from them. A deed cannot be set aside partially on the ground of fraud. If set aside at all, it must be in toto.[16] The decree proceeds on the ground of imposition, and grants a relief which could only apply to the pretended trust, which necessarily implies capacity in the grantor. It does not pass on the conveyance from the administrator of Comfort Wheaton, to the defendant, Caleb Wheaton. So long as the legal estate remains in him under that deed, the right of the plaintiffs is a nonentity.

11. The master's report is erroneous on several grounds, and ought to have been set aside. (1) Because, in taking the account, he refused to receive the testimony of the defendant, Handy, when it was competent and credible. (2) The *master required evidence of [*117 the consideration of a promissory note, when the signature was sufficiently proved.[17] (3) He held, also, that where a party charges himself with a certain sum, and at the same time discharges himself, it shall be evidence against him, but not for him.[18] The other exceptions to the master's report were also minutely discussed; but it is not thought necessary to state them, as they are enumerated, and fully examined, in the judgment of this court.

12. The final decree is erroneous in several particulars. (1) In directing a sale of the property under the circumstances. (2) Because it purports to bind, and does affect the interest of those who are not parties. (3) Because it wholly omits to provide for the defendant, Handy, as tenant by the curtesy. (4) Because it does not, unless by implication, determine all the matters in issue, and which ought to have been decided.

Mr. Wheaton, for the plaintiff below, in reply as to the want of proper parties, argued that, as by the local law, one coparcener could maintain an action at law for his share of the real estate, the same rule of proceeding would be adopted in equity. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the court below had considered the defendant, Caleb Wheaton, as legal owner under the administration sale, suf- [*118] ficiently representing all *the parties who could claim any beneficial interest; and he (as in effect a plaintiff) submitted to any decree the court could make in favor of the plaintiffs. Besides, the nature of the jurisdiction of the courts of the Union, which was derived from the character of the parties as citizens of different states, would prevent their insisting upon parties who were not absolutely necessary to the determination of the merits of the cause as between the parties before the court.[1] But, in this case, the court might apply the analogous rule, as to next of kin suing for distributive shares of personal property, one of whom may sue, and the rest may come in under the decree.[2]

Upon the merits, he insisted that the question as to the capacity of the grantor was not a question of absolute insanity. All the cases show that the court will interfere wherever a peculiar relation has been abused to influence or impose upon a person of weak mind. A commission of lunacy is not, by the modern practice of the Court of Chancery, confined to cases of strict insanity, but is applied to cases of imbecility of mind, to the extent of incapacity, from any cause, as disease, age or habitual intoxication.[3] This principle is fully developed by Lord Erskine in ex-parte Cranmer.[4] It was [*119] not, therefore, necessary *to show that the grantor was absolutely non compos mentis in a strict legal sense, still less was it necessary to prove that he was incapable at the precise moment the deeds were executed.

As to the defects in the pleadings, and the other informalities in the proceedings, it was said that the court would look with an indulgent eye upon the pleadings and practice in equity causes in those states, where, no state court of chancery existing, the forms of proceeding were less familiar to practitioners. But it was insisted that the bill contained a sufficient allegation of the incapacity of Comfort Wheaton to execute the deeds in question, to put that fact distinctly in issue, and it had been met responsively by the answer of the defendant, Handy, explicitly denying it.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The counsel for Asa Handy contend that the bill seeks to set up a parol trust, which is denied in the answer, and that the decree is founded on a supposed incompetency of Comfort Wheaton to convey his property. The decree, therefore, is not supported by the allegations of the bill.

They also contend that the decree is not sustained by the proofs in the cause.

That the bill alleges the conveyances of the 9th of May to have been received for the benefit of the family, is unquestionable; but this is not *incompatible with the incompe- [*120] tency of Comfort Wheaton to execute them. Deeds may be obtained from a weak man for the purpose of preserving his estate for himself and family, and of protecting him from the impositions to which he might be exposed; and there is nothing to restrain one of the heirs, who may think himself aggrieved, from bringing the whole case before a court of equity. If, indeed, it were true in fact, that the bill does not allege this incompetency so as to put it in issue, the objection would be conclusive; for it is well settled that the decree must conform to the allegations of the parties. But we think this bill is not justly exposed to this objection. It states the general correct conduct of Comfort Wheaton during the life of his wife; that, soon after her decease, he was visited by a paralytic stroke, which was followed by a total change in his conduct. He was addicted to intoxication, and to many vicious habits, in the course of which fears were excited in his family that he would waste all his property, or convey it to his profligate companions. They consulted together, and with their friends; and the first proposition was, to apply to the court for a guardian to manage his affairs, according to the law of Rhode Island in such cases. It was, however, finally agreed that Asa Handy should obtain deeds for his property, and hold it for the use of Comfort Wheaton during his life, and of his heirs after his death. The bill then proceeds to state that the said Asa Handy, knowing the premises, did induce the said Comfort, "he being in the state and condition *of body [*121] and mind aforesaid," for the nominal consideration of $2,178, to make the conveyances in the bill mentioned.

Although a more direct and positive allegation that Comfort Wheaton was incapable of transacting business, would have been more satisfactory than the detail of circumstances from which the conclusion is drawn, yet, we think that the averment of his incompetency is sufficiently explicit to make it a question in the cause. The defendant has met this charge, and we cannot doubt that this answer is sufficiently responsive to the bill to give him all the benefit which the rules of equity allow to an answer in such circumstances.

We proceed, then, to look into the proofs in the cause, and to inquire whether the testimony establishes the incompetency of Comfort Wheaton when these deeds were executed.

We have examined with attention the immense mass of contradictory evidence which the record contains. A number of persons, and, among others, the witnesses to the deeds, express the opinion that he was capable of managing his affairs, and of disposing of his property. This evidence, however, is met by such a mass of opposing testimony as can scarcely be resisted. Among the numerous witnesses who testify to the imbecility of his mind, are many who had been long and intimate acquaintances. All his physicians concur in stating, in strong and decided terms, the weakness of his mind, 122*] as well as his body, which they ascribe chiefly to the character of his disease. One of them, Doctor Barrows, attended him about the time these deeds were executed. He says: "With regard to the state of his mind, at all times when I saw him within the said period (from the 1st of March to the 25th of November, 1809), I can say that he appeared to me wholly incapacitated to transact any money business, or to have the care of any concerns whatever. It is my opinion that the decay of his mental faculties was such as to induce that state of fatuity which would unfit him for all the purposes relative to the affairs of life, except obeying the various calls of nature." Some of the witnesses add to their opinion of his imbecility, some circumstances on which the opinion is founded, which cannot fail to make a deep impression on the mind. Ziba Olney says that he was acquainted with Comfort Wheaton for the last five years of his life, who, for the last fifteen months of them, resided in his family. "That during the whole of these times he appeared to be childish, and incapable of transacting any business. The reasons of this opinion are, that he would frequently repeat the same questions, and would, several times in the same day, ask what day of the week it was. At short intervals he would talk rationally, and then would break off from conversation to singing, and from that to crying. That he would frequently go out in the night and day, naked, except his shirt. That he would frequently break out in profane language, and at other 123] times preach." Several other *witnesses describe the situation and conduct of this afflicted old gentleman, in a manner to add great weight to their opinion that his faculties were prostrated. Many even of those witnesses who depose to his competency, declare that the public opinion and language of his neighborhood was, that his mind was deplorably impaired; and the conduct and declarations of his family, including the defendant, Asa Handy himself, show a settled conviction that Comfort Wheaton was incapable of managing his affairs.

There is evidence of the consultations in which Handy participated, previous to the deeds of the 9th of May, for putting the old gentleman and his estate under guardianship; and there is also evidence of similar consultation respecting the propriety of procuring a conveyance of his property, in order to save it for himself and his family. This may not be admissible as proof of a trust; but it is strong evidence of a conviction that the person from whom the deed was to be obtained was unfit for the management of his own affairs. Among other testimony to this point, Abner Daggett deposes that Asa Handy asked him if he had a notion of buying his father Wheaton's lot. The witness answered that he had had some conversation with Wheaton about it; upon which Handy said, Wheaton was no more capable of selling his estate than a child. The witness was deterred from purchasing, though he wished to acquire the lot, by the fear of subsequent controversy.

The great and sudden revolution in the whole *conduct of Comfort Wheaton, imme-[*124 diately after the first paralytic stroke, viewed in connection with his advanced age, is a strong circumstance in corroboration of the opinion that his mind was diseased. A sober, prudent, reflecting and moral man, between seventy and eighty years of age, mingles with profligate people, to whom he devotes himself, and becomes suddenly intemperate, immoral, and childishly whimsical and indiscreet, so that his nearest friends think it necessary to put it out of his power to ruin himself.

The terms on which this old gentleman stood with his family, are not entirely unworthy of consideration. But two of his children, Caleb, and Mary, the wife of the defendant Asa, lived near him. From causes, some of which may be discerned in the record, he was on ill terms with Caleb. One of the witnesses deposes that he said, on one occasion: "You know, Asa, I made you the deeds to spite Caleb." There is other testimony to the same effect. The necessary consequence of this quarrel with Caleb was, to subject him, in an increased degree, to the influence of Mary Handy and her husband, and exposes the deeds conveying all his property to them to an increased degree of suspicion.

The inadequacy of the consideration, as stated in the bonds referred to in the answer, furnishes an additional argument against these deeds. It was chiefly the support of Comfort Wheaton for the residue of his life. This proved to be five years, which was a longer time than his age and state of health, at the time of the transaction, rendered probable; *but[*125 which was certainly not a full consideration for the property.

These various circumstances add so much weight to the opinions of those who depose to the incompetence of Comfort Wheaton, that the mind cannot withhold its assent from that conclusion. An issue, indeed, might have been directed; but we do not think it a case in which this course ought to have been pursued. The degree of weakness or of imposition, which ought to induce a court of chancery to set aside a conveyance, is proper for the consideration of the court itself; and there seems to be no reason for the intervention of a jury, unless the case be one in which the court would be satisfied with the verdict however it might be found. A verdict affirming the capacity of Comfort Wheaton to execute these deeds on the 9th of May, 1805, could not, we think, have been satisfactory to the court; and it was, consequently, not necessary to refer the question of competency to a jury.

If these deeds were obtained by the exercise of undue influence over a man whose mind had ceased to be the safe guide of his actions, it is against conscience for him who has obtained them to derive any advantage from them. It is the peculiar province of a court of conscience to set them aside. That a court of equity will interpose in such a case, is among its best settled principles. The cases cited in the argument, which we will not repeat, place this beyond the possibility of question. It was, therefore, proper to set aside the deeds, and to direct the defend-126*] ant, *Handy, to account for the money he had received under them.

But, although that defendant ought not to be permitted to benefit himself by his own improper act, it is not reasonable that he should be burthened with the debts of Comfort Wheaton, and the expenses of his maintenance. These are proper charges on the estate itself. So are improvements and repairs which enhanced the rents, and the value of the estate. As a defendant in equity, Asa Handy has certainly a right to retain them, and to receive credit for them in the account which was directed by the Circuit Court.

There is, we think, no error in the manner in which the account was directed to be taken.

The parties were heard before the master, who, after a very laborious and comprehensive examination of their accounts, has made a voluminous report, to which both parties have excepted.

It may be observed, generally, that it is not the province of a court to investigate items of an account. The report of the master is received as true, when no exception is taken; and the exceptions are to be regarded so far only as they are supported by the special statements of the master, or by evidence which ought to be brought before the court by a reference to the particular testimony on which the exceptor relies. Were it otherwise; were the court to look into the immense mass of testimony laid before the commissioner, the reference to him would 127*] be of little *avail. Such testimony, indeed, need not be reported farther than it is relied on to support, explain, or oppose, a particular exception.

1. The first exception made by Handy is, that only the sum of $5,448.26 were allowed him by the commissioner, instead of $101,167.30, the amount of his claim. This is a general exception, which comprehends, it is supposed, the particular alleged errors enumerated in the subsequent exceptions.

2. The second exception is, that the master did not admit his whole account on his own oath.

The conduct observed by the master on this point, is thus specially stated by himself: "I admitted" said Asa, "to make oath to all charges, whether for money, specific articles or services, which, from the circumstances of the parties, or the nature of the charge itself, could not, in my opinion, be proved by vouchers, or other legal evidence."

This rule, adopted by the master, is, in our opinion, one to which Handy could make no just objection. There can be no propriety in admitting the party as a witness to support items in an account, which, from their character, admit of full proof. Of this description are the items which constitute his third exception. It is the demand of testimony to support his charges for repairs and improvements. These repairs and improvements are susceptible of complete proof; and, as there could be no 128*] difficulty in procuring *it, the commissioner did right in requiring it. The fourth exception is to the rejection of his oath to discharge himself from rents, which, as he alleged, he had not received.

The commissioner has made considerable deductions from the total amount of rent, if calculated for the whole time, but has rejected the oath of Handy, because he admitted that he had kept ledgers in which his receipts of rents were regularly entered, which were still in his possession, but which he refused to produce. The decision of the master on this point was so obviously right that it need only be stated to be approved.

5. The fifth exception is, that the master has not allowed for repairs and improvements according to the measurement of Nathan Parks, which was on oath, but according to the estimate of John Newman, which was not founded on actual measurement, but made principally by the eye.

The master reports that, "in addition to the evidence produced by the parties, I appointed John Newman, an experienced and skillful measurer of carpenters' work, to go on the premises, together with the said Handy and myself, and to measure and estimate all such repairs, and alterations, and buildings, as said Handy, being under oath, should point out as being made and executed by him." The estimate of the said Newman, with his deposition, are referred to, and annexed to the report.

Newman deposes that his estimate is founded *on actual measurement, except parts [*129 of the roof of one building, which he took from the measurement of Nathan Parks. and of another, in which he was guided by the statement made by Handy himself of the length of the rafters, which accorded with his own estimate.

That a measurement thus made and proved, was entitled to more respect than the ex-parte measurement of Parks, cannot be doubted.

6. An exception is also taken to the report, because it disallows the charge made by Handy of a note, which he says was proved.

This exception, it is presumed, was not taken before the master, as he does not notice it, and it is too vague to be regarded. Neither the note, nor the ground on which payment is claimed, nor its amount, nor the reasons of its rejection, are stated; nor is there any reference to the evidence in support of it. Nothing is stated to induce a suspicion that the disallowance of it was improper. Yet the court, from its solicitude to discover whatever the record might contain on this subject, has looked through the report. Nothing is said, so far as we can perceive, respecting a note, except in the affidavit of Ziba Olney, who states that Asa Handy became the indorser of some note for Appleby, which was settled in some way in the board of Comfort Wheaton, on which note, he believes, Handy was sued. If this is the note to which the exception alludes, the claim is absorbed in the allowance made him for the board of Comfort Wheaton. But, whether it be the note or not, *the exception [*130 is totally unsupported, and cannot be sustained.

7. A seventh exception is, a charge of money alleged to have been received of Doctor Bowen, although he discharged himself therefrom on oath, in payments of different sums under twenty dollars each.

This is the application to a particular item of the principle contained in the second exception, and is disposed of with that exception.

8, 9. The eighth exception is a repetition of the objection to the manner in which Handy is charged with repairs, the master's report respecting which has been already stated to be satisfactory; and the ninth is a repetition of the claim to sustain his accounts on his own oath.

10. The tenth exception is to the requisition made on him to produce his ledger, in which entries had been made of the rents he had received; a requisition to which he objects, because it contained transactions anterior to the entries of rent.

The validity of this objection cannot be admitted. The ledger might be inspected in the presence of the defendant, Handy, and there could be no propriety in commencing the examination with prior transactions.

11. The eleventh exception respects the calculation of interest. The commissioner had made what are denominated rests in the account, instead of calculating interest on each minute item. This mode of calculating receipts and expenditures, in accounts consisting of 131*] numerous small *items, is recommended by convenience, and has been generally adopted. It seems to have been properly adopted in this case.

12. The twelfth and last exception is a repetition of the often repeated, and as often rejected claim, to be admitted to swear to his whole account.

The original plaintiffs except (1) to the allowance made to the said Asa Handy for buildings which were erected on the lot after the death of Comfort Wheaton, which are said to be no advantage to it.

But there is no proof, and no reason to believe, that these buildings were not a real advantage to the property, and did not increase the rent and the value. This exception, therefore, was properly overruled.

2. The second exception is to the admission of the said Handy's oath, in cases in which he refused to produce his books, and the books of Comfort Wheaton.

No example of this admission is given, nor is there any proof in support of the exception. The rule by which the master was governed has been already stated and approved.

3. The third exception is a repetition of the objection to the admission of items in the account of Handy, on his own oath; and is answered by a reference to that part of the report which relates to this subject, and which has been already stated.

The fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions are totally unsupported by evidence, and, consequently, cannot be sustained.

132*] *We think the Circuit Court did right in confirming the report of the commissioner.

Upon the return of this report, the Circuit Court directed the estates to be sold, and the money due to the said Asa Handy to be paid, in the first instance, and that one-fifth of the residue should be paid to each of the plaintiffs, that being the distributive share of each under the law of Rhode Island. The decree proceeds to authorize the heirs who were not made parties to come in and receive their distributive shares, on paying their proportion of the costs and charges of suit.

The objection to this decree is, that the children of Mary Handy, and the children of Daniel Wheaton, are not parties to the suit.

It has been supposed that it is not necessary, in Rhode Island, to make all the heirs parties, because, by the laws of that state, parceners can sue separately for their respective portions of the estate of their ancestor. This law would undoubtedly be regarded, in a suit brought on the common law side of the Circuit Court. Its influence on a suit in equity is not so certain. But, however this may be, we are satisfied that a sale ought not to have been ordered, unless all the heirs had been before the court as plaintiffs or defendants. Although the legal estate may be in Caleb Wheaton under the deed made by the administrator, yet he acknowledges himself to be a trustee for the heirs, having purchased for their benefit. They have, therefore, a vested equitable interest in the property, of which they *ought not to be deprived [*133 without being heard. They may choose to come to a partition, and to redeem their shares by paying their proportion of the money with which the estate is charged. The bill does not state that the heirs who are not made parties are unwilling to become so, or cannot be made defendants by the service of process. We think, then, that there is error in proceeding to decree a sale, without bringing all those heirs before the court who can be brought before it; and for this error the decree must be reversed, and the cause sent back, with liberty to the plaintiffs to amend their bill by making proper parties. If all the heirs cannot be brought before the court, the undivided interest of those who do appear, is to be sold, and the lien of Asa Handy is to remain on the part or parts unsold, to secure the payment of so much of the money due to him as those parts may be justly chargeable with.

Decree.—These causes came on to be heard, etc. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that there is no error in the interlocutory decree, nor in so much of the final decree as approves and confirms the report made by the master; but there is error in so much thereof as directs a sale of the premises therein mentioned, all the heirs who are shown to be interested in the said premises not being made parties, and it not being shown or alleged that they could not be made parties. So much of the decree, therefore, as directed a sale of the premises in the *bill mentioned, is reversed and [*134 annulled, and the residue thereof is affirmed; and the cause is remanded to the said Circuit Court, with liberty to the plaintiffs to make all proper parties, that the whole may be sold if all the heirs can be made parties, otherwise the shares of such as are made parties. Each party to pay his own costs in this court.

HENRY CASSELL, Administrator of Louisa Browning,
v.
CHARLES CARROLL, of Carrollton.

The title and claim of Charles Lord Baltimore, his heirs and representatives, to the quit-rents reserved by the proprietary of the late province (now state) of Maryland, was extinguished by the agreement between the heirs, devisees and personal representatives of the said Lord Baltimore, and of his son and heir Frederick Lord Baltimore, made in 1780, and confirmed by an act of the British Parliament in 1781.

It seems, that a bona fide assignment, for a valuable consideration, made by a husband, of a debt actually and presently due to his wife, devests, in equity, the title of the wife.

But, however this may be in general, the agreement made in 1780, including the quit-rents then actually due (if at all) to Louisa Browning, the daughter of Charles Lord Baltimore, and assigning them to Henry Harford, the devisee of Frederick Lord Baltimore, having been entered into in England, by the husband of Louisa Browning and her committee (she being a lunatic), and the consideration having actually gone beneficially for her use, 135*] and the *whole transaction having been between British subjects, under the direction of the High Court of Chancery, and confirmed by an act of parliament, transferred a complete legal and equitable title to the assignee.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This was an action of debt, brought by the plaintiff in error in the court below, for the recovery of certain quit-rents alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff's intestate. The special verdict found by the jury stated the following facts:

The jury find, by their verdict, that Charles the First, in the eighth year if his reign, granted to Cæcelius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore, his heirs and assigns, forever, in fee-simple, the province (now state) of Maryland, by a charter dated the eighth of June, 1633. Cæcelius Calvert died in 1675, and left Charles, afterwards Baron of Baltimore, his son and heir, who entered into the said province, and was seized thereof. The said Charles, in 1711, granted, according to the laws of the province, to Charles Carroll, Esq., father of the defendant, a patent for a tract of land containing ten thousand acres, " to have and to hold the same unto him, the said Charles Carroll, his heirs and assigns, forever; to be holden of us and our heirs, as of our manor of Baltimore, in free and common socage by fealty only for all manner of services, yielding and paying therefor, yearly, unto us and our heirs, at our receipt at the city of St. Mary's, at the two most usual feasts in the year, viz., at the feast of the annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and 136*] *St. Michael the arch-angel, from and after the second day of April, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1723, the rent of one hundred pounds sterling in silver and gold."

The defendant inherited the said tract of land from his father, and is now seized and possessed of the same. On the 31st day of December, 1698, the said Charles Lord Baltimore executed a deed, by which he settled the province of Maryland on himself; remainder on his son Benedict for life; remainder on the heirs male of the body of the said Benedict; remainder to the said Charles in fee. There were trusts created in the said deed, all of which are determined. The said Benedict died in 1714, and Charles, his father, 1715. The said Benedict left issue male Charles his heir, afterwards Lord Baltimore, and proprietor of Maryland. Benedict left other sons, all of whom died without issue.

The last mentioned Charles entered into the province of Maryland, and was seized thereof, as the law requires; and, on the 11th day of July, 1730, executed a deed to trustees, to the use of the said Charles and his assigns for life, remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Charles in tail male successively; remainder to the use of the said Charles in fee. There were other trusts created in the deed, but they were all determined at the death of Mary, the wife of the said Charles, which took place in 1769.

In 1692, an act was passed by the legislature of Maryland, which declares that no manor, land, *tenements or hereditaments [*137 whatsoever, within the province, shall pass from one to another, except the deed or conveyance be acknowledged before certain magistrates, and enrolled or recorded. This act was in force when the indenture of the 31st of December, 1698, was executed, but the said indenture was not acknowledged or recorded. The legislature of Maryland, in 1715, ch. 47, passed an act which requires deeds, and leases for more than seven years, to be acknowledged and recorded within six months from their date. It also declares all deeds, not acknowledged and recorded, according to the provisions of the act of 1692, to be void. The deed of the 11th of July, 1730, was neither acknowledged nor recorded.

The last mentioned Charles Lord Baltimore had issue only one son, named Frederick, and two daughters, one named Louisa (who is the plaintiff's intestate) and the other named Caroline. The said Charles Lord Baltimore, being seized of the province of Maryland as aforesaid, made his will in 1750, and devised the province of Maryland to trustees, for the use of his son Frederick, and his assigns, for life; remainder to the use of the sons lawfully begotten of the body of the said Frederick, successively in tail male; remainder to the daughters of the said Frederick; "and, in default of such issue, then to the use and behoof of Louisa, my eldest daughter, her heirs and assigns, forever." Charles Lord Baltimore died seized the 23d day of April, 1751. The *said Frederick [*138 Lord Baltimore died without lawful issue, on the 4th day of September, 1771.

Louisa, the plaintiff's intestate, was married to John Browning, on the 15th day of May, 1762, and remained covert baron of the said John until 1792, when he died. The said Louisa was a lunatic from the year 1780 till the day of her death, which took place in November, 1821. She has never been in the state of Maryland since the death of her father. Letters of administration were regularly granted to the plaintiff on the 17th day of April, 1823.

Frederick, the son of Charles Lord Baltimore, entered into the province of Maryland, and was seized thereof as the law requires. On the 1st day of July, 1761, the said Frederick, and Cæcelius Calvert, his uncle, executed a deed of bargain and sale to Thomas Bennett and William Sharp, of the province of Maryland, and its appurtenances, for the purpose of docking the entail of the province. On the 8th of April, 1767, the said Frederick executed a deed of lease and release of Anne Arundel manor, and all other manors held by the lord proprietary in the province, to Bennett Allen, and recoveries were afterwards suffered of the said manors, in pursuance of the said deed of lease and release. On the 4th day of March, 1771, Frederick Lord Baltimore made his will, and devised the province of Maryland, and all its appurtenances, to Henry Harford.

That upon the death of the said last-mentioned Frederick, Baron of Baltimore, Henry 139*] Harford, the devisee named in his will, was a minor, and a ward, under the guardianship of the Court of Chancery in Engand, and so continued until 1779. That the said Henry Harford, as devisee as aforesaid, was recognized and acknowledged by the provincial government of Maryland, as the lawful proprietor under the charter, and by his guardians, with the knowledge and consent of the British government, entered into the possession of the government of the province of Maryland, and received the rents and revenues thereof as proprietor, until the beginning of the disturbances which separated the United States of America from the British government. That those disturbances began in 1774, at which time the people of the province of Maryland took the government of the said province into their own hands, and ousted the officers of the proprietor; and the government of the said province so continued in the hands of the people until the declaration of independence, the 4th of July, 1776. That no quit-rents, nor any revenues which fell due in the said province after the year 1773, were paid to the proprietor or his officers; that, after the revolutionary war, the British government paid to the said Henry Harford £60,000, as a compensation for his losses in Maryland by the revolution; and paid to the above-mentioned John Browning, and to Robert Eden, who married the above-mentioned Caroline, £10,000 each, as a compensation for their losses in the said province, by the said revolution. That 140] suits in the Chancery Court of *England were instituted in 1772, by the said Browning and wife, and the said Eden and wife, against the said Harford, to recover the province and revenues of the said province of Maryland, which suits continued until 1782, when the said bills were dismissed by the complainants.

In 1780, the legislature of Maryland passed an act, which declares that "the citizens of Maryland, from the declaration of independence, and forever, be, and they are hereby declared to be, exonerated and discharged from the payment of the aforesaid quit-rents, and that the same shall be forever abolished and discontinued."

In 1780, an agreement was entered into in England, by deed, between Henry Harford of the first part, John Browning, the husband of Louisa Browning, and Sir Robert Eden and Caroline, his wife (the said Louisa and Caroline being the heirs-at-law of Frederick Lord Baltimore), of the second part; Sir Cecil Wray, the committee of the real and personal estate of the said Louisa (she being a lunatic) of the third part, and Hugh Hammersley and Peter Prevost, two of the executors named in the will of Frederick Lord Baltimore, of the fourth part, all the said parties being British subjects. The agreement makes an absolute cession of the province, and revenues, etc., from the time of the decease of Lord Frederick, to Henry Harford and his heirs, upon the payment (among other things) of £10,000 to John Browning and Louisa, his wife, and £10,000 to Sir Robert Eden and Caroline, his wife, in the manner stipulated in the agreement. *It also provided in the event of the [*141 restoration of Henry Harford to the possession of the province and its revenues, growing, or in arrear, for an additional sum of £10,000, for the benefit of each of said ladies, payable out of the same. The agreement further stipulated for an application to the British parliament for an act to confirm the same, and to vest in Henry Harford and his heirs, the title to the province, and its revenues, with a provision that the agreement should be void unless the royal assent should be given to the act within three years. The act, accordingly, passed, and was assented to by the King within the period prescribed. It vests the title to the province, and its revenues, and quit-rents, etc., absolutely in Henry Harford and his heirs, subject only to the payment of the sums before mentioned, and some others not material to be stated.

Upon this special verdict, a judgment was entered in the court below pro forma, by consent, for the defendant, and the cause was brought, by writ of error, to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Webster and Mr. Raymond for the plaintiff, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Taney for the defendant.

It has not been thought proper to report the arguments of counsel, at large, involving a great variety of feudal and constitutional learning, which the court did not think it necessary to examine, as the cause was determined upon the single point of the effect of the agreement made *in 1780, and con- [*142 firmed by act of Parliament in 1781.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended,

1. That the deeds of 1698 and 1730 were void under the acts of assembly of 1692 and 1715, referred to in the special verdict; and that, consequently, Charles Lord Baltimore, the testator of the plaintiff's intestate, was tenant in fee-simple of the province of Maryland, at the time of his death in 1751.

2. If those deeds were not void, then the said testator was tenant in tail under the deeds, with reversion in fee, which reversion was a devisable interest, and was well devised to the plaintiff's intestate.[1]

3. Payment of rent to Henry Harford, or his agents, did not discharge the defendant from his liability to pay the plaintiff.

4. The act of the legislature of Maryland of 1780, which professes to abolish the quit-rents from and after the declaration of independence, is void, on the general principle of the law of nations, that a division of an empire does not affect vested rights of property, and by the special provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783, and the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain. The original charter to the first Lord Baltimore, distinguished between his public and his private character, and meant to confer upon him bene- [*143 ficial rights of property independent of his political character as the ruler of the province. At all events, the act of 1780 could not affect, retrospectively, the quit-rents which were then actually due, and had accrued from the death of Frederick Lord Baltimore in 1771, until May, 1780, when the act was passed.[1]

1.—Calvert's Lessee v. Eden, 2 Harr. & M'Henry's Rep. 279, 337; opinion of Sir F. Hargrave, S. C. Ib. 341.

5. That the agreement of 1780, alleged to have been confirmed by act of parliament in 1781, is no bar to the plaintiff's right of action.

Upon this last point (which was the only one determined by the court), it was argued for the plaintiff, that the agreement contemplated a restoration of Henry Harford to the possession of the province, and the payment of large sums of money consequent on that event, and that this being an essential part of the contract, which became incapable of execution by the result of the war, the agreement could not legally be enforced. It was also contended that it was not competent for John Browning, the husband, as such, to convey the title to these quit-rents belonging to Louisa Browning, his wife, so as to bar her, in case of survivorship, from the right of recovery,[2] and that, she being a lunatic, no act done by her committee could in any manner affect her rights. A mere intention to reduce into possession the wife's [*144 choses in action, has been held insufficient to bar the widow of her right to them.[3] So, a general assignment in bankruptcy has not the effect of reducing into possession a legacy of stock in trust for the bankrupt's wife, whose right by survivorship will be established against the assignees.[4] And a transfer of stock into the wife's name, to which she became entitled as a distributive share of personal estate during the marriage, will not be considered as a payment or transfer to her husband, so as to defeat her right by survivorship.[5] Supposing, therefore, the husband had agreed to transfer this specific claim, it would only operate as an equitable assignment; the assignee must sue in the name of the husband; and if he did not recover during the life-time of the husband, the right would survive to the wife. But in no point of view could it be considered as a legal defense, or be pleaded in bar of this action.

On the part of the defendants, it was insisted,

1. That as soon as Maryland became a sovereign and independent state, the quit-rents which fell due after the declaration of independence, were due to the state, and not to the representative of Lord Baltimore. They belonged to him in his public political character as lord proprietary, and not in his in- [*145 dividual private capacity.[6]

2. That Henry Harford, being acknowledged by the province of Maryland, and by the King of Great Britain, as the proprietor of Maryland, was, by such acknowledgment, the lawful proprietor, and entitled to the quit-rents until Maryland became an independent state.[7]

3. If the province was private property, and entailable and devisable, that the entail was barred by Frederick Lord Baltimore, and the devise to Henry Harford was good.

4. If Henry Harford was not lawful proprietor, he was proprietor de facto, and, as such, payment to him would discharge the tenants.

5. That the treaties with Great Britain have no application to rents falling due subsequent to the declaration of independence. At all events, the act of assembly of 1780 effectually confiscated the quit-rents due before that time, and so devested the title of whoever might be entitled to them, as to extinguish all claim to those quit-rents.[8]

6. That the agreement of 1780, confirmed by act of parliament in 1781, bars the plaintiff's right of action.

Upon this last point, it was argued for the defendant, that John Browning, the [*146 husband, had a right to bind all the rights of Louisa Browning, the wife, with respect to such debts as were then actually due and payable, and therefore had a right to transfer, for a valuable consideration, the quit-rents, actually and presently due. The cases cited on the other side did not shake this principle. The case of Blount v. Bestland[9] was not the case of a sale for a valuable consideration, but of a bequest by a husband to his own children, of a legacy due to the wife, which he had not reduced to possession. Mitford v. Mitford[10] was the case of a general assignment of all his effects by a bankrupt husband, and the court determined that it did not pass a legacy which he had not reduced into possession. But the argument manifestly admitted that a particular assignment of the specific legacy for a valuable consideration would have produced the effect. The case of Hornsby v. Lee,[11] was the sale of a wife's reversionary, not a present interest. So that the power of the husband over the wife's present debts, immediately recoverable, remained untouched by these decisions. But, in the present case, the wife was a ward of chancery, and was represented by her committee in the transaction, which was advantageous for her, the benefit of which she had received, and now actually enjoys. The compromise was confirmed by an act of parliament obtained on an application of the parties, and ought, [*147 therefore, to be considered as annihilating all her claims to the subject in controversy.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case of an action of debt, brought by the plaintiff as administrator of Louisa Browning, against the defendant, for the recovery of certain quit-rents asserted to be due to the intestate, as proprietary of the province of Maryland, and accruing between the years 1771 and 1780. In the Circuit Court for Maryland district, upon the trial of the cause upon the general issue, a special verdict was found, upon which that court gave judgment pro forma for the defendant, and the cause has been brought before us for a final decision, by a writ of error.

The cause has been here argued with great ability and care. Many important and difficult points have been discussed at the bar, upon which, if we were called to pronounce a decision, we should wish for more time and consideration to mature our judgment. But, as we have all come to a conclusion upon one point, which finally disposes of the whole cause, it is deemed proper at once to put the parties in possession of our opinion, without attempting to analyze the learning which is involved in others of more complexity, and would require more extensive researches.

For the purposes of the present decision, it is assumed (without, however, meaning to inti- 148*] mate *any real opinion on the subject) that every other difficulty in respect to the title and claim of Louisa Browning to the quit-rents in controversy, is overcome, and the question of the effect of the agreement concluded between the parties in June, 1780, and subsequently confirmed by parliament in the year 1781, is that to which the court has addressed its attention. If that agreement, so confirmed and executed, as the case finds, extinguished, in point of law, the title of Louisa Browning to these quit-rents, and passed it to Henry Harford, there is an end to the present suit. And such, upon the best consideration of the case, in our judgment, was the legal effect of that agreement so confirmed and executed.

The agreement is quadripartite between Henry Harford of the first part, John Browning, the husband of Louisa Browning, and Sir Robert Eden and Caroline, his wife (the said Louisa and Caroline being the heirs-at-law of Frederick Lord Baltimore), of the second part; Sir Cecil Wray, the committee of the real and personal estate of the said Louisa, she being a lunatic, of the third part, and Hugh Hammersly and Peter Prevost, two of the executors named in the will of Lord Frederick, of the fourth part. The object of the agreement was to make a final settlement between the parties of all differences, and particularly to settle the title to the province of Maryland, and all the hereditaments and revenues connected therewith. It makes an absolute cession of 149*] the province and revenues, etc., *etc., from the decease of Lord Frederick, to Henry Harford and his heirs, upon the payment (among other things) of £10,000 to John Browning and Louisa, his wife, and £10,000 to Sir Robert Eden and Caroline, his wife, in the manner stipulated in the agreement. It further stipulates, in the event of the restoration of Henry Harford to the possession of the province and its revenues, growing or in arrear, for an additional sum of £10,000, for the benefit of each of these ladies, payable out of the same; but as that event never occurred, it is unnecessary to dwell further upon it. The other sums were duly and regularly paid. The agreement further stipulated for an application to be made to the British parliament for an act to confirm the same, and to vest in Henry Harford and his heirs, the title to the province, and its revenues, etc.; with a provision, that the agreement should be void unless the royal assent should be given to the act within three years. The act passed, and was assented to by the King within the period prescribed. It vests the title to the province, and its revenues, and quit-rents, etc., absolutely in Henry Harford in fee, subject only to the payment of the sums before mentioned, and some others not material to this cause.

What is there, then, to prevent the agreement and act from having full effect? The parties were all British subjects resident within the realm; the act of parliament was passed upon their own application and agreement; all persons in interest were fully represented, so far as by *law they were capable of [*150 being represented; the conditions stipulated have been complied with; the confirmation was absolute; and the intention was, to extinguish, at law, as well as in equity, every claim of Louisa Browning to the quit-rents now in controversy.

It has been argued that the agreement contemplated a restoration of Henry Harford to the possession of the province, and the payment of large sums consequent thereon; and that, this being a material ingredient in the contract, which became incapable of execution, the agreement ought not to be enforced, or held obligatory. It would be a sufficient answer to this objection, that the parties, at the time of the execution of the agreement, knew perfectly well that the province had assumed independence, and that the chance of restoration depended upon the issue of the war then waged between the United States and Great Britain. The acted upon that state of things, and provided for the payment of these additional sums, only in the event of an unsuccessful struggle on the part of the province. The stipulation, therefore, has not failed, in point of consideration, from the misconduct of either party; but the event, in which alone it was to have any effect, never has occurred. The payment was conditional, and the condition has never arisen upon which alone the contract could act.

But there is another answer presented by the very terms of the agreement itself. It is, that the parties expressly agreed that the title to the *province, etc., should vest absolute- [*151 ly upon the payment of the first £10,000; and, of course, the other provisions were to rest in covenant only between the parties, and were not to be construed to defeat or devest that title. The act of parliament treats it in that way, and vests the title in Henry Harford in fee, conclusively.

It has been further argued that it was not competent for John Browning, the husband, as such, to convey the title to these quit-rents belonging to his wife, so as to bar her, in case of survivorship, from the right of recovery; and that, she being a lunatic, no act done by her committee could in any manner touch her rights.

It is to be recollected that the quit-rents, as claimed, were debts then actually due (if at all) to Louisa Browning. They were not future, contingent, or reversionary interests vested in her. How far, in respect to such interests, the husband, or the committee of a lunatic, is by law authorized by a conveyance or assignment to dispose of her rights, is a question which we are not called upon to decide, and upon which we give no opinion. The case here, is of choses in action actually due to the wife. There can be no question that he was entitled to receive them to his own use, or to extinguish them by a release. What, then, is there to prevent him from disposing of them by assignment, at least in equity?

It does not appear to us that it has ever yet been decided that a bona fide assignment for a valuable consideration, made by a husband to a third person, of a debt actually and presently 152*] *due to his wife, does not devest, in equity, the title of the wife. So far as authorities have gone, they seem to proceed upon a different and opposite doctrine. The case of Lumb v. Milnes, 5 Ves. Rep. 517, and Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. Rep. 87, are distinguishable. They were cases of a general assignment under the bankrupt laws, which are not supposed to do more than place the assignees in the same situation as the bankrupt himself. The case of Hornby v. Lee, 2 Madd. Rep., 16 turned upon another distinction that the interest was not a present, but a reversionary interest. But, without deciding any general principle, we think that under the particular circumstances of this case, where the consideration has actually gone beneficially for the wife, and the whole transaction has been under the direction of a court of chancery, and been confirmed by parliament, the assignment was, to all intents and purposes, valid to assign the rents. If, in ordinary circumstances, such an assignment would pass an equitable title only, we think the act of parliament makes it, to all intents and purposes, a legal title and assignment. Without dwelling upon the known principles of the paramount and omnipotent authority over private rights and authorities, which is often attributed to parliament, it may be justly said that it is competent for the legislature, upon the application, and with the consent of all the parties in interest, to give a legal and conclusive effect to their own agreements, and to pass that at law, which the parties, in the most *unreserved manner, [*153 intended to pass. A title so passed, and so confirmed, by authorities perfectly competent to make it, ought, under such circumstances, to be recognized as valid in the tribunals of every other country.

This is a summary exposition of the views of the court upon this subject; and it at once disposes of the whole matter in controversy. The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed with costs.[1]

1.—Mr. Justice Duvall, being a landholder in Maryland, did not sit in this cause.*

*The editor has supposed that it would gratify the curiosity of the learned reader to be presented with the following note (with which the editor has been favored by his friend Mr. Taney) of an argument of the Court of King's Bench, in 1775, upon a case sent from the Court of Chancery, in the suit brought by Sir Robert Eden et al. v. Henry Harford, to recover possession of the province of Maryland and its revenues, in which the learning respecting the nature of the dominion and proprietary interest of Lord Baltimore in the province, was very elaborately discussed:

"TRINITY TERM, 15 Geo. III. B. R., Tuesday, 27th June, 1775.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill, for Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Eden.

"He first stated the case, and when he had finished this, Lord Mansfield asked in what shape the cause came before the court, and for whom Mr. Serjeant Hill was to argue. The Serjeant answered that the case came from Chancery to know whether the last lord had a right to devise; and that, if he could not, it was the same to Master Harford whether the property went to Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Eden, the last lord's sisters, as co-heirs of the first grantee of Maryland, or to Mrs. Browning alone, as devisee of her father. Lord Mansfield then observed that there would have been no question if the estate had been 154*] situated in England, and *that the ground of the doubt was its being a seigniory and proprietary government in America.

Mr. Serjeant Hill proceeded in his argument to the following effect:

"The general question is, whether the province, and proprietorship, and port duties of Maryland, are well devised by the will of the last Lord Baltimore; and to show that they could not pass, I shall submit two general points.

"1. That the property is so high in its nature, and, in other respects, so peculiar, as not to be devisable.

"That the subsisting entails were not well barred by the last Lord Baltimore, either because he did not do the proper and necessary acts for barring, or because such entails were not capable of being barred in any way.

"I apprehend that the proprietorship of Maryland is not alienable without the license of the crown, and much less devisable.

"The design of the Maryland charter was to erect a province in the district called Maryland, to establish a form of government similar to our own, and to place Cæcil Lord Baltimore, and his heirs, at the head of it. The highest powers are conferred, and, perhaps, the crown's right to grant some of them may be doubtful; but it is not necessary to this case to determine which could, and which could not, be granted. The charter gives royal jurisdiction, and a royal seigniory. Of the first kind are the powers of enacting laws with the consent of the assembly, of erecting courts, of appointing magistrates, of punishing criminals, and of levying men, and all the powers of war and peace. Of the second kind is the power of making subinfeudations. The charter reserves a tenure of the King as of the castle of Windsor; for the law would otherwise have created a tenure in capite. The King cannot grant without reserving a tenure, for he cannot change the principles of the constitution, one of which is, that there must be a tenure. The King constituted Lord Baltimore the lord and proprietor of the whole province. There is no instance before of the grant of a proprietorship. But though there was not before any such sovereignty in name, yet, in specie there was such a property, and the counties palatine of Chester and Durham resembled it. From the high nature of these powers and jurisdictions, I argue that the province could not be alienated without license of the *crown, nor [*155 could it be a subject of the statute of wills. At the time of that statute, no such high property existed in the empire. The 32d of Henry VIII. in giving the power of devising, mentions manors, lands, tenements and hereditaments. It begins

SMITH

On a demurrer to evidence, the judgment of the court stands in the place of the verdict of the jury; and the defendant may take advantage of any defects in the declaration, by motion in arrest of judgment, or by writ of error.

It seems that, as against the maker of a promissory note, or against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable at a particular place, no averment in the declaration, or proof at the trial, of a demand of payment at the place designated, is necessary.

But, as against the indorser of a bill or note, such an averment and proof is, in general, necessary.

Where the bill or note is made payable at a 172*] particular bank, and the *bank itself is the holder, such averment and proof may be dispensed with: and all that is necessary is, for the bank to examine the account of the maker with them, in order to ascertain whether he has any funds in their hands.

On a demurrer to evidence, the court is substituted in the place of the jury as judges of the facts, and everything which the jury might reasonably infer from the evidence, is to be considered as admitted.

The practice of demurring to evidence is to be discouraged, and courts will be extremely liberal in their inferences where the party takes the question of fact from the appropriate tribunal.

Proof necessary to support an action against the indorser of a bill or note.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This cause was argued by Mr. Lear for the plaintiffs,[1] and by Mr. Taylor for the defendant.[2]

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the judgment of the court:

This case comes before the court on a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, and the questions presented for consideration grow out of a demurrer to the evidence, and out of exceptions taken to the declaration.

The action is by the plaintiffs, as indorsees, *against the defendant, as indorser of [*173 a promissory note drawn by William Young. The note is made payable at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in the city of Washington. And the questions which have been raised and argued relate, in the first place, to the sufficiency of the averment in the declaration of a demand of payment of the drawer of the note; and, second, to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the plaitniffs' right of recovery. It is alleged, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that this court cannot look beyond the demurrer, to the evidence, and inquire into defects in the declaration. This position cannot be sustained. The doctrine of the King's Bench, in England, in the case of Cort v. Birkbeck, Dougl. Rep., 208, that, upon a demurrer to evidence, the party cannot take advantage of any objections of the pleadings, does not ap-with manors, and though hereditaments, which is the last word, would, singly, have been sufficient to have extended to this property, yet, coupled with the former words, it is not so. The 13 Eliz. cap. 10, s. 3, begins with enumerating deans, etc. and then adds, all others having spiritual or ecclesiastical promotions; but bishops and archbishops, being higher than deans, are not included. So, the statute of wills, beginning with manors, shall not extend to a higher dominion, such as proprietary government. Dependent kingdoms are not devisable without the consent of the superior prince. Dominion is not the subject of testamentary disposition; and Craig says that all feudists agree in this. Nor are things given for the support of dominion, such as the port duties here, in their nature devisable. With us the King cannot devise the lands and revenues allotted for the support of his royal dignity. This, indeed, has not been the subject of judicial decision; and in The Banker's case, Lord Somers, though he reversed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, avoided this point; but our Kings never attempted to exercise such a power. See 5 Mod. Rep. 46, and Lord Somers' argument in The Banker's case. The 9 and 10 Wm. III. cap. 23, which gave a revenue to King

NOTE.—As against maker of note, or acceptor of bill, no proof of demand is necessary, but is against indorser.

In general, no demand of payment of a note is necessary in order to sustain an action against the maker. His undertaking is unconditional. Brent v. Bk. of Metr., 1 Pet. 89; Haxtun v. Smith, 3 Wend. 13.

Where a note is payable at a bank, it is not necessary to make a personal demand upon the maker or acceptor elsewhere. It is his duty to be at the bank within reasonable hours to pay the same. Bk. of U. S. v. Smith, 11 Wheat. 171; Fullerton v. Bk. of U. S. 1 Pet. 604; Bk. of U. S. v. Carneal, 2 Pet. 543; Covington v. Comstock, 14 Pet. 43; Hildeburn v. Turner, 5 How. 69; Bk. of Met. v. Brent, 2 Cranch, C. C. 530.

As against the maker of a note, or acceptor of a bill, payable at a specified place, it is not necessary for the holder to make a demand at such place, as a condition precedent to bringing the action, and, therefore, it is not necessary to aver such demand in the complaint, or prove it at the trial. As against them, an action is sufficient demand. If the maker or acceptor was at the place designated, ready to pay, and offered to pay the money, he may plead it as a tender in bar of damages and costs, by bringing the money into court. Foden v. Sharp, 4 John. 183; Wolcott v. Van Santboord, 17 John. 248; Fairchild v. Ogdensburgh R. Co. 1 E. P. Smith, N. Y. 337; Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. 136; Caldwell v. Cassidy, 8 Cow. 271; Haxtun v. Bishop, 3 Wend. 13; Brabston v. Gibson, 9 How. 263; Green v. Youngs, 7 Barb. 652; Silver v. Henderson, 3 McLean, 165; Kendall v. Badger, 1 McAll. 523; Brown v. Pratt, 2 Cranch, C. C. 253; Beverly v. Beverly, 2 Cranch C. C. 470; Smith v. Johnson, 2 Cranch, C. C. 645; Bk. of U. S. v. Bussard, 3 Cranch, C. C. 173; Caldwell v. Cassidy, 8 Cow. 271; Troy City Bank v. Grant, Hill & D. Supp. N. Y. 119.

The acceptor of a bill stands in same relation to the drawee as the maker of a note does to the payee; and the acceptor is the principal debtor. In the case of a bill, precisely like the maker of a note. The place of payment is of no more importance in the one case than in the other. Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. 136.

No demand before suit necessary against maker of a note payable "at either of the banks of Boston." Brown v. Noyes, 1 Wood. & M. 75, 85.

As to presentation of bills for acceptance, see note to Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. 365.

As to time of presentment of note or bill, and of notice of protest, see note, Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch, 259.

As to time of demand and notice, and manner of giving notice of protest, see note to Russard v. Levering, 6 Cranch, 102.

ply. By a demurrer to the evidence, the court in which the cause is tried is substituted in the place of the jury. And the only question is, whether the evidence is sufficient to maintain the issue. And the judgment of the court upon such evidence will stand in the place of the verdict of the jury. And after that, the defendant may take advantage of defects in the declaration, by motion in arrest of judgment, or by writ of error. But, the present case being brought here on writ of error, the whole record is under the consideration of the court; and the defendant, having the judgment of the court below in his favor, may avail himself of 174*] all defects in the declaration *that are not deemed to be cured by the verdict.

The objection to the declaration is, that it does not contain an averment that a demand of payment of the maker of the note was made at the place where it was made payable.

It is a general rule in pleading, that where any fact is necessary to be proved on the trial, in order to sustain the plaintiffs' right of recovery, the declaration must contain an averment substantially of such fact, in order to let in the proof. But the declaration need not contain any averment which it is not necessary to prove. For the purpose, therefore, of determining whether the declaration in this case is substantially defective, for want of an express averment that demand of payment of the maker was made at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in the city of Washington, it is proper to inquire whether proof of that fact was indispensably necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to recover.

Whether, where the suit is against the maker of a promissory note, or the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable at a particular place, it is necessary to aver a demand of payment at such place, and, upon the trial, to prove such demand, is a question upon which conflicting opinions have been entertained in the courts in Westminster Hall. But that question may, perhaps, be considered at rest in England, by the decision in the late case of Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & Bingh. 165 in the House of Lords. It was *there held, that if a bill of ex-[*175 change be accepted payable at a particular place, the declaration in an action on such bill against the acceptor, must aver presentment at that place, and the averment must be proved. A contrary opinion has been entertained by courts in this country, that a demand on the maker of a note, or the acceptor of a bill payable at a specific place, need not be averred in the declaration, or proved on the trial. That it is not a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right of recovery. As matter of practice, application will generally be made at the place appointed, if it is believed that funds have been there placed to meet the note or bill. But, if the maker or acceptor has sustained any loss by the omission of the holder to make such application for payment at the place appointed, it is matter of defense to be set up by plea, and proof. (4 Johns. Rep., 183; 17 Johns. Rep. 248.)

This question, however, does not necessarily arise in the case now before the court, and we do not mean to be understood as expressing any decided opinion upon it, although we are strongly inclined to think that, as against the maker or acceptor of such a note or bill, no averment, or proof of demand of payment at the place designated, would be necessary.

William for his life, recites to be for his household and family expenses; and now, by the civil list act of Queen Ann, the alienation of the crown revenue is expressly provided against. But, even before the civil list act, there is no instance of a devise of the royal revenues. In the present case, it could not be intended that the port duties should be alienable. The port duties were created for the benefit of the subject, and they, and the proprietorship, were intended to go together. But, I insist further, that the lands themselves are not alienable. Anciently, when the King made a duke, and gave possession to him, they were so annexed to the dignity as not to be transferrable without a preceding act of parliament. See Godb. 397. In Dyer, fol. 2, a. there is a case very analogous to the present; for there it is said, that if the King creates a duke and gives him £20 a year for the maintenance of his dignity, he cannot give it to another, because it is not incident to his dignity. Many things, of a special nature, are unalienable. 156*] Dignities *are so, because they are personal, and in the blood. Offices of trust are not assignable unless by the original terms of the grant, or by prescription, which supposes such a grant. Ministerial offices are, indeed, assignable, and the power of appointing a deputy is incident where the office is assignable, but not vice versa. See Bro. Abr. tit. Office, pl. 108. The office of forester is of such a trust that it cannot be granted over without license. 4 Inst. 315. The Register and Fitzherbert, there cited, warrant Lord Coke in his doctrine. Earldoms are not alienable. The case about the office of Great Chamberlain in Sir W. Jones, 96, and Collins' Baronies, contain much learning on this subject, which applies strongly here. Doddridge, who was with the majority of the judges, states everything which made against his own opinion.

"Lord Mansfield: The case is very well reported both in Sir W. Jones, and in Collins; but there is a great difference between offices and territories.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill: The judges who held the office alienable, only held it partly so, that is, that it might be settled so as to keep it in the male line; because males were more fit for the office than women. But they agreed that, though the office was granted in fee, it could not be disposed of from the blood of the first grantee. In the present case, it is observable that the charter makes a difference in the use of the word 'assigns.' That word is used in granting the land, but is omitted where the charter gives the power of calling assemblies, and enacting laws, of appointing judges, and of pardoning crimes. Therefore, these powers, at least, were not intended to be alienable.

"2. If the whole of the property, or any part, is disposable by will, it must be so on this ground, that all the statutes and laws of England in force at the time of the settlement of Maryland, attached on the province, though subsequent statutes will not extend to it without express words. Then I have a right to assume that the property is entailable; for the statute De Donis was an existing law at the time of the grant and settlement of the province, as well as the statute of wills, and so was the statute of uses. Now, the property was entailed, and, upon the supposition that the entail was within the statute De Donis, I argue that the entail was *not well barred by the [*157 last Lord Baltimore, and that this gives a title to his sister, Mrs. Browning, all the entails being now spent for want of issue male, and she being the devisee of the reversioner in fee, by the will of her father.

"Lord Baltimore's mode of barring was by lease and release, a conveyance the weakest of all in its operation. Before Machell & Clarke, it was understood that such a conveyance, by tenant in tail, would only pass an estate during his life; and, even according to that case, the estate it passes is voidable on his death by entry of the issue in tail. See Machell v. Clarke, 3 Lord Raym. Rep. 678; 2 Salk. Rep. 619; 7 Mod. Rep. 18, and Com. Rep. 119. As against those in remainder, it still passes only an estate during the life of a tenant in tail. But a feoffment, without warranty, would have been a discontinuance, and, with warranty, when it becomes collateral, it

But, when recourse is had to the indorser of a promissory note, as in the present case, very different considerations arise. He is not the original and real debtor, but only surety. His undertaking is not general, like that of the maker, but conditional, that if, upon due dili-176*] gence having *been used against the maker, payment is not received, then the indorser becomes liable to pay. This due diligence is a condition precedent, and an indispensable part of the plaintiffs' title, and right of recovery, against the indorser. And when, in the body of the note, a place of payment is designated, the indorser has a right to presume that the maker has provided funds at such place to pay the note, and has a right to require of the holder to apply for payment at such place. And whenever a note is made payable at a bank, and the bank itself is not the holder, an averment, and proof of the demand at the place appointed in the note, are indispensable. In the present case, the bank at which the note is made payable is the holder, and the question arises, whether, in such case, an averment and proof of a formal demand are necessary. If no such proof could be required, the averment would be immaterial, and the want of it could not be taken advantage of upon a writ of error.

In the case of Saunderson et al. v. Judge, 2 H. Bl. Rep. 509, the plaintiffs, at whose house the note was made payable, being themselves the holders of the note, it was held to be a sufficient demand for them to turn to their books and see the maker's account with them, and it was deemed a sufficient refusal to find that the maker had no effects in their hands. So, in the case of The Berkshire Bank v. Jones, 6 Mass. Rep. 524, decided in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, Chief Justice Parsons, *in delivering the opinion of [*177 the court, said that, "the plaintiffs being the holders of the note, we must presume it was in their bank, and there it was made payable. They were not bound to look up the maker, or to demand payment of him at any other place. The defendant, by his indorsement, guarantied, that on the day of payment the maker would be at the bank and pay the note, and if he did not pay it there, he agreed he would be answerable for it without previous notice of the default of the maker." The rule here laid down has received the sanction of that court in subsequent cases (12 Mass. Rep. 404; 14 Mass. Rep. 556), and is founded in good sense and practical convenience, without in any manner prejudicing the rights of the maker, or the indorser of the note. The indorser, knowing that the maker has bound himself to pay the note at a place appointed, has a right to expect that he will provide funds at that place to take up the note; and he will be more likely to be exonerated from his liability, by having the demand made there, than upon the maker personally. But, if the bank where the note is made payable is the holder, and the maker neglects to appear there when the note falls due, a formal demand is impracticable by the default of the maker. All that can in fitness be done, or ought to be required, is, that the books of the bank should be examined, to ascertain whether the maker had any funds in their hands; and if not, there was a default, which gave to the holder a right to look to the *indorser for payment. And even this [*178 examination of the books was not required in would have become a bar at this day; for the statute of Ann doth not take away the effect of collateral warranty when it is by a tenant in tail in possession. See 4 and 5 Ann, c. 16. Therefore, I say that this was one mode by which Lord Baltimore might have barred the entail; because, if he had made a feoffment with warranty, the warranty would have been collateral to Mrs. Browning.

"But there was another mode of barring which might have been used. The province of Maryland is a fief holden of the King as of the castle of Windsor, for so the tenure is reserved. As, in the grant, is not similitudinary, but is the same as ut in pleading that one was seised ut de feodo, which, says Lord Coke, is to be understood positively that the party was seised in fee. Co. Litt. 17, 6. The tenure, then, being as of the castle of Windsor, the province is to be considered in the same way as other lands originally holden of the castle, and, like other fiefs, is to be impleadable within the manor. A castle, or honor, is only a superior kind of manor. To every manor a court baron is necessarily incident, and, therefore, it is so to every castle. The jurisdiction of a court baron is well known. Without the King's writ, it holds plea of personal actions where the demand doth not amount to 40s. With the King's writ of right, it may hold plea of land. Writs of right are of two kinds, patent and close. If the writ is brought in the Lord's Court, it is directed to him, and is patent. If he holds no court, or waives, or the tenure is immediately of the King, it is brought in the King's Court, is directed to the 158*] sheriff, and is close. Magna *Charta, c. 24, provides against the abuse of the writ of right in the latter case, by declaring, that præcipe in capite shall not issue where the land is not holden in capite. But the practice is otherwise, and the writ of right has been usually brought in the Common Pleas in all these cases. Another writ of right close lies for lands in ancient demesne. This writ is well known, and recoveries are suffered upon it in the courts of ancient demesne. See Fitzh. Nat. Br. and Booth on Real Actions.

The general writ of right patent lies in the Court of the Manor, in all cases where the tenure is of the subject, or of the King, as of an honor; and where the estate lies, makes no difference. 4 Inst. 219, and Fitzh. Abr. Jurisdiction, pl. 61, there cited. If a man holds lands as of an honor, the bailiff may execute the process as of the court of the honor wherever the lands lie. In the case of Fitzh. Abr. it was objected, that the officers of the county palatine of Chester could not execute writs in a foreign county; but it was adjudged otherwise, because the lands were within a manor holden of the principality of Chester.

"There are many precedents of recoveries on writs of right patent. One is in N. Bendl. p. 4, pl. 4, on a writ of right patent directed to the bailiff of the castle of Rising. According to this ancient principle, that wherever a fief lies it is impleadable in the manor of which it is holden, the province of Maryland might have been impleaded in the Court of the Castle of Windsor, for it is clearly holden of the castle, and there is a court baron necessarily incident. True it is, that if the tenant pleads a foreign plea, or the mise is joined on the mere right to be tried by the Grand Assize, the cause must be removed into the Common Pleas. But, I insist that a writ of right patent might have been brought in the Court of the Castle of Windsor, and that a common recovery might have been suffered; because, then, neither foreign plea, nor joining of the mise, on the mere right by the grand assize is necessary. The precedent cited from N. Bendl, is in point, and conformable to the principles I am arguing upon. The writ of right patent was for a manor holden of Rising Castle, and was directed to the bailiffs of the castle. It appears clearly that there was a recovery in the Court of the Castle Rising. There was a plaint by the demandant, the tenant vouched to warranty, and the vouchee making default, judgment was given for demandant. Afterwards, a writ of false judgment was brought in the Common Pleas by the *vouchee, and [*159 the error was, that the writ of right patent should have been directed to the suitors; but the court the cases cited from the Massachusetts Reports. The maker was deemed in default by not appearing at the bank to take up his note when it fell due. We should incline, however, to think that the books of the bank ought to be examined, to ascertain whether the maker had any balance standing to his credit; for, if he had, the bank would have a right to apply it to the payment of the note; and no default would be incurred by the maker, which would give a right of action against the indorser.

The declaration in this case does contain an averment that the note was presented to the maker, that he refused to pay it, and that notice of the non-payment was given to the indorser. Whether this averment is broad enough to admit all the proof necessary to sustain the action against the indorser, is the question which arises upon the declaration. If, by reason that the bank where the note was made payable was the holder, no personal presentment or demand of the maker could be required, the averment, so far as it asserts such presentment, is surplusage, and no proof was necessary to support it. What, then, in such case, is a presentment of the note? It would be an idle ceremony to require the bank to take the note from its files, and lay it upon the counter, or make any other public exhibition of it. All that could be required is, that the note be there, ready to be delivered up if payment [*179] should be offered. When the note is held by a third person, it is practicable, and there is a fitness in requiring the holder to inquire at the bank for the maker, and whether he has provided any funds there to pay the note. But when the bank itself is the holder, it would be impracticable for it to make such inquiry in any other manner than by ascertaining that the note was there, and examining the books to see if the maker had any funds in the bank. If the note was there, it was a presentment, and if the maker had no funds in the bank, it was a refusal of payment, according to the legal acceptation of these terms under such circumstances.

The evidence upon the trial was introduced under this averment without objection, and if that is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the court ought not readily to yield to technical objections, where the defendant has had the full benefit of whatever defense he had to make. Under this state of the case we think the exception taken to the declaration cannot prevail. And the next inquiry is, whether the evidence to which the defendant demurred was sufficient to sustain the action.

By this demurrer, the defendant has taken the questions of fact from the jury, where they properly belonged, and has substituted the court in the place of the jury, and everything which the jury could reasonably infer from the evidence demurred to, is to be considered as admitted. The language of adjudged cases on this subject is very strong to show that the court will be extremely liberal in their inferences, where the party, by demurring, [*180] will take the question from the proper tribunal. It is a course of practice, generally speaking, that is not calculated to promote the ends of justice. If the objection to the sufficiency of the evidence is made by way of motion for a nonsuit, it might be removed by testimony within the immediate command of the plaintiff. The deficiency very often arises from mere inadvertence, and omission to make inquiries, which the witnesses examined could probably answer.

held that the bailiffs were the proper persons, and the judgment was affirmed. See Mod. 1. Another instance of a like proceeding in the Court Baron of the Manor of Wolverhampton, is in Robbins' Ent. 323. There, false judgment was brought on this error, that the lands were not mentioned to be within the manor; but the judgment was affirmed. In Rastell there are several instances of writs of false judgment on judgments in writs of right close in courts of ancient demesne. Rast. Entr. 221, b. Also, Booth states the manner of proceeding in the Court Baron on the writ of right patent, where the cause is not removed. Booth on Real Actions, 89. If, then, a recovery might be had on a writ of right in the Court Baron, when the proceeding is adverse, much more might a common recovery be suffered. Errors in common recoveries are aided by the statutes of jeofails, and no objection is fatal to them but such as might be pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court where they are suffered. But how could such an objection hold in this case? Every plea to the jurisdiction must state that there is another court in which the cause may be tried, and which that court is. Therefore, if want of jurisdiction is objected to the Court Baron of Windsor Castle, it should be stated where else the province of Maryland can be impleaded; for fines have been levied in the Court of Common Pleas here, of shares of a proprietorship in America. The only proprietorships at present are Pennsylvania and Maryland; but Carolina was once a proprietorship, and whilst it was so, fines were levied here of shares in it. The first grant of Carolina was to eight persons, and the word "assigns" was used throughout. Scire facias was brought to repeal the letters patent; but no judgment was ever given, for the proprietors were well advised, and agreed to surrender, and an act was made to confirm the agreement. See 2 Geo. II. c. 34. Though the proprietors were seized in fee, yet this act recites, that from the nature of the estates proposed to be surrendered, great difficulties might arise as to the manner of conveying. In the present case, like difficulties induced the advisers of the last Lord Baltimore to recommend the applying to parliament; but no act was obtained.

"Lord Mansfield: He was stopped by the difficulty of proceeding.

*"Mr. Serjeant Hill: The last thing I [*180] have to submit is, that if no recovery could be suffered, and feoffment with warranty would not have been sufficient, then the entail was not barrable in any way, and the province of Maryland was in the same condition as land here, before the introduction of common recoveries, and of barring by fine under the statute of Hen. VII. Like an executory devise, the entail is not barrable, because a recovery cannot be suffered. See the case of Scatterwood v. Edge, 12 Mod. Rep. 278. The words of Lord Hardwicke, in 2 Ves. Rep. 353, are very applicable. In speaking of the limitations in the act of parliament, which made the Isle of Man unalienable, he says that if they were considered on the foot of the statute De Donis, and they were estates tail, there was no want of a restrictive clause; for, before Taltarum's case, which established the doctrine of recoveries, and the 4 of Hen. VII. of fines, these, by the statute De Donis, were unalienable, and of Man there could be neither fine nor recovery? Here, I say, that the property is not entailable; but, if it is, it must be because within the statute De Donis, and, if that statute operates upon Maryland, and no recovery could be suffered, there was a perpetuity. It is absurd to say that there must be the means of making property alienable because it is within that statute; for the statute was made to restrain alienation. A recovery might have been sufficient to bar; but the conveyance by lease and release is too mild in its operation, and on such a conveyance by tenant in tail, the old use reverts to the releasor.

"The capability of losing in an action is a very different thing from the power of alienation. What is the objection to a perpetuity in such a case as this? Can any useful end be attained by

In order to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to support the action, it is proper to state what proof was necessary.

The plaintiffs, to entitle them to recover, were bound to show that they were the indorsees and holders of the note; that the note was at the bank, where it was made payable at the time it fell due; that the maker had no funds there to pay the note; and that due notice of the default of the maker was given to the defendant.

The indorsement of the note to the plaintiffs, and that it was discounted in the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Washington, where it was made payable, was fully proved. And the jury would have had a right to presume that the note was then at the bank where it was discounted; and the bank being the holder and owner of the note, the presumption, at least prima facie, is, that it remained in the bank, to be delivered up when paid. This establishes the two first points; and, to show that the maker had no 181*] funds in the bank, *the book-keeper was examined as a witness, who swore, that on the 19th day of July, 1817, when the note fell due, there was no balance to the credit of the drawer, or either of the indorsers, on the books of the bank. And the remaining question is, whether due notice of the default of the maker was given to the defendant The only objection to the sufficiency of the evidence on this point is, that the notice of non-payment was left at the post-office in the city of Washington, addressed to the defendant at Alexandria, without any evidence that that was his place of residence. The testimony on this point is that of Michael Nourse, a notary public, who swore, that on the date the note fell due, he presented it at the store of the defendant, and demanded payment of his clerk, who replied that Mr. Young was not within, and he would not pay it. And that, on the same day, he put in the post-office notice of non-payment, addressed to the defendant at Alexandria. If the defendant's place of residence was Alexandria, it is not denied but that due and regular notice was given him. The notary was a sworn officer, offically employed to demand payment of this note, and it is no more than reasonable to presume that he was instructed to take all necessary steps to charge the indorsers. This must have been the object in view in demanding payment of the maker. And it is fair, also, to presume that he made inquiry for the residence of the defendant before he addressed a letter to him; for it is absurd to suppose he would direct to him at that *place, without some knowledge or in- [182 formation that he lived there, this being the usual and ordinary course of such transactions, and with which the notary was, no doubt, acquainted. The jury would, undoubtedly, have been warranted to infer, from this evidence, that the defendant's residence was in Alexandria. If that was not the fact, this case is a striking example of the abuse which may grow out of demurrers to evidence. For, a single question to the witness would have put at rest that point, one way or the other, if the least intimation had been given of the objection. It was, manifestly, taken for granted by all parties, that the defendant lived at Alexandria. And if a party will, upon the trial, remain silent, and not suggest an inquiry, which was obviously a mere omission on the part of the plaintiff, a jury would be authorized to draw all inferences from the testimony given, that would not be against reason and probability; and the court, upon a demurrer to the evidence, making a sovereignty alienable? The cases of copy-holds are not authorities in point, for they depend on custom. Here Mr. Serjeant Hill cited many authorities to confirm and illustrate some of the doctrine he had advanced in the previous part of his argument. He cited Co. Litt. 108, a; Dy. 44 a, and Bro. Abr. Tenure, 94 to show the difference between tenure ut de corona, and ut de honore, and that it was in the King's option to reserve either; Co. Litt. 17 a, and 1 Lev. 222, to prove the word ut, affirmative and not similitudinary; Co. Litt. 5a; 2 Inst. 31, and the Register, to prove a castle contains a manor; and 4 Inst. 26; Hob. 170, and 2 Bro. Abr. 45, to prove that a court Baron is incident to a manor, and that they are inseparable. For, the distinction 161] *between writs of right patent, and writs of right close, and the causes of removal, and that where the former lie, they may be preferred to the latter, he cited Fitzh. Nat. Br. 1 to 9, and 11 to 14; Old Nat. Br. Fitz. Abr. tit. Droit, pl. 45; Magna Charta, cap. 24 and Bro. Abr. To show that it was immaterial where the land happened to lie, he cited Fitzh. Abr. tit. Jurisdiction, pl. 61 and 4 Inst. 219. He then observed that the King might make a new island arising out of the sea part of a county, and for this he cited Collis. on Sew. 45, and asked why he could not make a province part of an honor. He also cited from 1 Str. Rep. 177, the case of The King v. The City of Norwich (which was the case of an information against the latter for not repairing some bridges), to show that the King may enlarge, contract or vary the bounds of a county, for the purpose of jurisdiction. He next mentioned, a second time, that fines had been levied of shares of the Carolina proprietorship; and added, that error on a fine of land in America had been brought in B. R., and that it might be proper to search, in order to know what was done.

"Lord Mansfield: Fines, and recoveries of plantations in America, with a viz. to bring them within a parish here, were frequent in the Court of Common Pleas, till provincial laws were made to provide other modes of barring. But I do not know of any instance of such fines or recoveries in the case of a seigniory.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill: In 1 Ventr. Rep. 258, Lord Hale says that the writ of right close (for lands in ancient demesne) is not to be resembled to another præcipe, and that being directed ballivis manerii, mention of the manor, without naming the will in which the lands lie, is sufficient. So, here, mention of the castle of Windsor in the writ of right patent, without a viz. to bring Maryland within England, would have been sufficient. Lord Chief Justice North, in 2 Mod. Rep. 49, observes that it had been long a dispute whether a fine of lands in lieu conus was good; that in King James' time it was settled to be so, and that, by the same reason, a recovery shall be good; for they are both amicable suits and common assurances, and as they grow more in practice the judges have extended them further. He adds, that a common recovery may be of an advowson, and that no reasons are to be drawn from *the visne, or [*162 execution of the writ of seisin, because it is not an adverse proceeding, but by agreement. This is material, for common recoveries of advowsons were anciently in writs of right; and though writs of entry are now used, they are improper for an advowson, and they are only allowed because common recoveries are by agreement. The observation about the writ of seisin answers the reason in 1 Ventr. Rep. 59, why an ejectment of lands in Jamaica will not lie here, and shows that it is not applicable to the present case. That where one jurisdiction is pleaded to, another must be shown, I cite Barker v. Dormer, 1 Show. Rep. 191; and that a seigniory out of England may be impleaded in the courts here, I cite 4 Inst. 213; Bro. Abr. Jurisdiction, 101; Lien, 75; Trial, 58; Fitzh. Abr. Assize. 282; Vaugh. Rep. 405. As to suing for ancient demesne lands, I cite 1 Salk. Rep. 56, and 1 Lord Raym. Rep. 43.

"Upon the whole, the property in question is will draw the same conclusions that the jury might have drawn.

We are, accordingly, of opinion that the evidence was sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to recover; that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause sent back, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiffs, upon the demurrer to evidence, for the amount of the note, and interest.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
VANZANDT.

The case of The United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. Rep. 720, revised, its authority confirmed, and applied to the present case.

An omission of the proper officer to recall a delinquent paymaster under the injunctions of the 4th section of the act of the 24th of April, 1816, c. 69, does not discharge his surety.

The provisions requiring the delinquent paymaster to be recalled, and a new appointment to be made in his place, are merely directory, and intended for the security of the government; but form no part of the contract with the surety.

The statute not removing from office the delinquent paymaster, ipso facto, but only making it the duty of the proper officer to remove him, the circumstances of new funds being placed in his hands after his delinquency, does not discharge the surety.

THIS cause was argued by the Attorney-General and Mr. Swann for the plaintiffs,[2] and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Key for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of debt brought in the

1.—The demurrer to evidence is an unusual and antiquated practice, which this court, and other courts, have recently endeavored to discourage, as inconvenient, and calculated to suppress the truth and justice of the cause. It is allowed or denied by the court where the cause is tried, in the exercise of sound discretion, under all the circumstances of the case; and it seems that the exercise of this discretion cannot be made the foundation of a writ of error. The party demurring is bound to admit as true, not only all the facts proved by the evidence introduced by the other party, but also all the facts which that evidence legally may conduce to prove. It follows that it ought never to be admitted, where the party demurring refuses to admit the facts which the other side attempts to prove; nor where he offers contradictory evidence, or attempts to establish inconsistent propositions. Young v. Black, 7 Cranch's Rep. 565; see also, Powling et al. v. The United States, 4 Cranch's Rep. 219; Phil. Evid. 216, 217; Bull. N. P. c. 4, p. 313.

2.—They cited The United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. Rep. 720.

neither alienable nor devisable, or, at least, the seigniory is not so. If the property is both alienable and devisable, then I insist that it is entailable, and that the entail is not barred.

"The supposed necessity of barring by lease and release, doth not exist; for,

"(1) There might have been a feoffment with warranty, and, (2) the province being holden of Windsor Castle, is impleaded in the Court Baron there, and a common recovery might have been suffered there. Besides the authorities already cited, to show that the bailiffs of that court were officers competent to hold plea of the province in a writ of right patent, there is one in Aston's Entr. 375. If a recovery could not be suffered in the Court of the Castle of Windsor, it might have been suffered on a præcipe quod reddat in the Court of Common Pleas; and the property not being in England was no objection to a recovery, either in the Common Pleas, or the Court of Windsor Castle. If it is denied that a recovery could be suffered in either of these courts, it must be shown what court has the proper jurisdiction, or the objection cannot be taken. If a recovery could not be suffered anywhere, then I insist that the entail of the property made it unalienable, 163*] *and that it descended as a perpetuity; of Lord Hardwicke in 2 Ves. Rep. 353, and of and that it might so descend, I cite the authority Jenkins in his Centuries, 250 and 257.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill concluded with citing a case about the writ of right patent in 6 Co. Litt. 11.

"Mr. Kenyon for Master Harford: The principal questions in this case, arise on the grant by the crown of the province of Maryland in the 8 Charles I. and the settlements made of it in 1730 and 1761. The grant by the crown being by letters patent under the great seal of England, the law of England is therefore the rule by which the property must be adjudged upon. It has been truly observed by the court, that no points could arise if the property was in England. If the property was situate here, it would be alienable, devisable and entailable, and the entail might be barred by common recovery. But the property lies in America, and thence arise the difficulties.

"The questions referred to this court concern both the province and the port duties, and their value is great. But the great value and extent of the property will not make any difference in deciding upon it, though its situation will. The province of Maryland was settled by Englishmen, and these carried the law of England with them. In 2 P. Wms. 75, it is said to have been adjudged by the Privy Council, that if a new country is found out and settled by English subjects, they carry their laws with them, though subsequent acts of parliament, without naming, will not bind the plantation. The like doctrine is laid down in Penn v. Baltimore, 2 Ves. Rep. 349, with more precision; for, there it is said, that an English colony carries with them all the laws of England in being at the time of planting it, which are adapted to the situation; but that no statute, made afterwards, binds without naming them. Now, both the statute De Donis, and that of wills, were before the settlement of Maryland, and both have words sufficient to comprehend the proprietorship, the word "tenement" being used in the former, and "hereditament" in the latter. Therefore both statutes must extend to the property in question, unless it can be shown that there is something incongruous in applying them to Maryland. But they are necessary and convenient laws for Maryland, nor is the law of descents more so. It is objected, that these statutes may extend to lands granted to the lord proprietor *in the way of subinfeudation, but that [*164 they ought not to be applied to the seigniory and proprietorship. But no reason is given for the distinction, except saying that the proprietorship is a transcendent property, and hath regalities and high powers annexed to it. Is an assignee or devisee less likely to be fit and able to govern it than the descendants of the first grantee, who may be infants? Higher property than this hath been the subject of wills; for kingdoms have been devised. Constantine devised an empire, and so did Charlemagne; and the same was done in our own country by Henry VIII. under an act of parliament. It is said that the property is not alienable, because it is annexed to an office of trust. But lands to which offices are annexed, may pass together with the office. When the champion of

Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, upon a paymaster's official bond, against the defendant in error, one of the sureties in that bond. The condition of the bond, as set out upon oyer, is in the following words, viz.: "That whereas the above bounden John Hall 185*] is appointed paymaster *of the rifle regiment in the army of the United States; now, if the said J. Hall shall well and truly execute, and faithfully discharge, according to law, and to instructions received by him from proper authority, his duties as paymaster aforesaid, and he, his heirs, etc., shall regularly account when thereunto required, for all moneys received by him from time to time, as paymaster aforesaid, with such person or persons as shall be duly authorized and qualified on the part of the United States for that purpose, and, moreover, pay into their treasury such balance as, on final settlement of the said J. Hall's accounts, shall be found justly due from him to the United States, then," etc.

To the declaration filed in this action, the defendant pleads that the said John Hall did well and truly observe and discharge, according to law, and to instructions received by him from proper authority, his duties as paymaster in the rifle regiment of the army of the United States, and did pay into the treasury such balance as, on settlement, was found due, and hath observed, kept and fulfilled every matter and thing in the condition of the said bond which, according to the said condition, ought to have been observed and kept.

The breach set out in the replication is, that the said J. Hall did not pay to the United States the sum of ———— which was due and in arrear, on a certain day, and which he ought then to have paid according to the condition of his bond.

*Upon the trial of the issue formed [*186 on the matter stated in the replication, a bill of exceptions was taken to the opinion of the court, by the United States, which states that to support the issue on the part of the United States, they gave in evidence a certified copy of the bond aforesaid, together with the account of the United States against the said J. Hall settled at the treasury department, and duly certified according to law, whereby it appeared that a balance of $29,266.06 was due to the United States by the said J. Hall, as paymaster of the rifle regiment of the army of the United States. Whereupon the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if, from the evidence aforesaid, they should believe that John Hall, named in the condition of the bond, had neglected and failed to make any report to the Paymaster-General once in two months, showing the disposition of the funds previously transmitted, with estimates for the next payment of the said regiment, and had also neglected and failed, either to transmit such estimates, or to render his vouchers to the Paymaster-General for settlement of his accounts, more than six months after receiving funds, and was not recalled for such default and neglect, but additional funds were placed in his hands, notwithstanding his known defaults and neglects in the instances aforesaid, then the defendant is not chargeable for any failure of the said J. Hall to account for such additional funds so placed in his hands after his said defaults and neglects, in respect of the England passes his manor, his office passes with it. The province of Maryland may be resembled to a large manor. The jurisdictions of some manors were anciently as extensive, both in criminal and civil matters, as the jurisdiction of the lord of Maryland. The power of making by-laws to regulate commons, and other subjects, relative to the tenants, is incident to many manors.

"But the question doth not depend merely on arguments of analogy. The proprietorship is granted in free and common socage, and it was intended to be alienable. The word "assigns" is used in the letters patent, and, in some places, is applied to the seigniory itself. The first grantee would not have accepted the grant on other terms. We should consider, not the present value of the property, but its value when the grant was made; and then Maryland was a desert, and it is not to be supposed that the first grantee would have been at the expense of settling it, if it had not been made alienable. Besides, the usage since the grant is an argument in favor of its being alienable. Both Maryland and Pennsylvania have been constantly subjects of entails and settlements, and this practice ought to weigh something. Another strong argument arises from the preamble of the statute 2 Geo. II., c. 34, about the shares of the Carolina proprietorship. In deriving titles to the several shares, wills are mentioned. This shows that it was deemed to be within the statute of wills. The preamble also recites a cause in chancery about an agreement to sell the share of one Dawson, and a decree by the lords for a specific performance, on an appeal. The preamble further recites various grants to show title in those with 165*] whom the crown was contracting *for the surrender of their shares. All this shows that parliament thought a proprietorship in America alienable like other property.

"Lord Mansfield: In Dawson's case, the question between the parties was not about the power of alienating.

"Mr. Kenyon: The statute of 7 and 8 Wm. III., c. 22, s. 16, is also of consequence, for it restrains all persons, and their assigns, claiming any right or propriety, in any islands or tracts of land on the continent of America, by charter, or letters patent, from selling to any but natural born subjects. This act supposes a proprietorship to be alienable.

"Lord Mansfield: The clause in the act of William is odd. Without such a restriction, aliens were incapable of purchasing.

"Mr. Kenyon: In Penn v. Lord Baltimore the question of alienation actually occurred; and though it was not necessary to decide upon it, yet Lord Hardwicke seems indirectly to have given an opinion that the proprietorship of Maryland was alienable. See 1 Ves. Rep. 448.

"Lord Mansfield: The question before Lord Hardwicke was on the effect of an agreement between the Penn and Baltimore families, about the limits of Maryland and Pennsylvania, it being contended that Lord Baltimore had not power to dismember his province, though he might make subinfeudations; but the question was determined without deciding anything on the power of alienating the whole province.

"Mr. Kenyon: I cite the case for the sake of Lord Hardwicke's dictum, and not as an adjudication. Thus, I am in possession of the opinion of the legislature, and of the House of Lords, and of Lord Hardwicke, as authorities to show that the property is as alienable as other property. It remains to show that the entail was well barred by Lord Baltimore, so as to enable him to dispose by will; and this Mr. Sergeant Hill makes the great point. The question is as to the whole province and seigniory, and not as to any particular parts or subinfeudations. If it had arisen on the *latter, the forms required by the provincial [*166 laws might have been complied with. But no court within the province can hold plea of the seigniory itself. See Vaugh. Rep. 404. If no court can be found in Maryland for a common recovery, some other court must be found, or there must be some mode of barring the entail without a recovery. When this cause was before the chancellor, Mr. Sergeant Hill said that a recovery might have been suffered before the King in council; but that ground is now deserted.

"Lord Mansfield: If anything had been done for barring there, it could only have been a proceeding having analogy to common recovery, the council being the proper place for adverse pro-

187*] funds *previously received, were known as aforesaid. The court gave the instruction as prayed; and a verdict being found for the defendant, a writ of error was sued out to the judgment rendered thereon.

The counsel for the plaintiffs in error have rested their cause entirely upon the decision of this court in the case of The United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. Rep. 720, and as we do not feel disposed to dissent from the opinion given in that case, it becomes material, in the first place, to inquire whether the two cases are the same in principle or not. If they are, it will avoid the necessity of any general reasoning upon the point decided in this cause by the court below.

The case referred to arose upon the act of Congress for the collection of the direct taxes, and internal duties. The action was founded upon the collector's bond against the sureties; and one of the questions which came up for decision was, whether the failure of the comptroller to call the collector to account at the periods prescribed by law, and the consequent injury to the sureties, did not discharge them from their responsibility upon the ground of laches? By the 28th section of the above act, the Comptroller of the Treasury is required, in case any collector should fail to collect, or to render his account, or to pay over quarterly, or sooner, if required, the moneys by him collected, immediately after such delinquency, to issue a warrant of distress against the delin-188*] quent collector, to be *levied on his personal estate, and, in case that should prove insufficient to satisfy the warrant, then upon his real estate. The decision of this court was, (1) that laches is not imputable to the government, and (2) that the provisions of the law requiring settlements by its officers to be made at short periods, are designed for the security and protection of the government, and to regulate the conduct of those officers; that they are merely directory to the officers, and form no part of the contract with the surety.

The correctness of these principles is admitted by the counsel for the defendant; but they insist that they are inapplicable to the case of a surety in a paymaster's bond, because, by the 4th section of the act "for organizing the general staff, and making further provision for the army of the United States," if the paymaster fail to render his vouchers to the Paymaster-General for settlement of his accounts, for more than six months after his having received funds, the injunction of the act is imperative, "that he shall be recalled, and another appointed in his place."

It is contended by the defendant's counsel that this section leaves no discretion in the proper officer of the government to continue the paymaster in office after his delinquency, but that he ceases thereafter to be paymaster, and the responsibility of his sureties is terminated.

It must be conceded that the injunction on the proper officer of the government to recall the delinquent paymaster, is expressed in very strong *language. But whether the [*189 omission to perform the act, amounts, under every possible circumstance, to a breach of official duty, may admit of some doubt. May it not be excused in a case where the paymaster has been prevented from rendering his vouchers at the periods mentioned in the act, by causes acknowledged by the government to have been beyond his control? And, if it may, it would seem that the ground of excuse could not properly be made a subject of judicial inquiry in an action against the surety. It may further be remarked, that if it had been the policy and intention of the legislature, that the act of delinquency should be inexorably fol-ceedings about the title to Maryland. The jurisdiction over all the seigniories of the provinces in America, has resided in the Privy Council from the time of Elizabeth.

"Mr. Kenyon: Two places for suffering a recovery have been mentioned—the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of the Castle of Windsor. As to the former, it is said that fines have been levied of lands in America, with a viz. to bring them within England. But the plea for land is local, and it is impossible by a viz. to transfer the place to England; and two or three precedents are not sufficient for this purpose. As to the Court of the Castle of Windsor, I admit, that one manor holden of another may be pleaded for in the principal manor; but I do not know of any instances in which there can be such a plea, except the cases of copy-hold, and of lands in ancient demesne. Besides, how is seisin to be given of Maryland by a court baron in England? It is said that a recovery may be on a writ of right in the Court Baron of Windsor Castle; but, if such a court exists (which I do not admit), it is allowed, that joining the mise carries the cause to the Common Pleas, and the moment the suit comes there it fails, for that court cannot give seisin; and this deficiency, according to the case of the Isle of Man, in 2 Ves. Rep. 353, would make the recovery ineffectual. It is said that Maryland might have been annexed to a county in England; but the answer is, that it is not so annexed. Further; it doth not appear that a court baron is incident to the castle of Windsor. Such a court may belong to the honor of Windsor; but Maryland is holden 167*] of the castle, and *the castle and honor are distinct. A castle may be part of an honor or manor. Fitzh. N. B., 6 d. I am told that the only court belonging to the castle is for personal actions.

"If the entail was not barrable by common recovery, it is to be considered whether an alienation by some other common assurance is not sufficient. The mode by lease and release is found fault with; but this conveyance is founded on the statute of uses, and, since that statute, it passes the fee as well as any other. As to feoffment with warranty, in general, it would have failed; and I am not sure that it would have had the proper effect, in the case which hath happened, because here the warranty would have descended both on Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Eden, as heirs of their brother; and, on the supposition that the property is entailable, to prevent perpetuities, the entail must be barrable in some way. In general, the power of barring by common recoveries is incident to entails; and if that mode had not been adopted, the other modes would have been found out. Where common recoveries cannot be suffered, alienation is sufficient; and whether it be by feoffment, or lease and release, the effect ought to be the same. In the case of copy-holds, where there is a custom for entailing, and no custom for a common recovery, a surrender is equivalent to a recovery. This point was adjudged by three judges against one, in Carr v. Singer, 2 Ves. Rep. 603, and the doctrine was approved of by Lord Hardwicke in a subsequent case. See Moor v. Moor, 2 Ves. Rep. 601, which case, though given by the reporters before Carr and Singer's, is subsequent in point of time. These authorities alone are sufficient; but the same principles in favor of alienation are to be met with in ancient books. In Willion v. Berkley, Plowd. Rep. 244, Judge Weston argues on the principle that every estate tail is barrable; and, in Mary Portington's case, 10 Co. Litt., 40 a, Lord Coke mentions that Lord Dyer, in a case before the Lords in Parliament, reproved one of the counsel for finding fault with common recoveries. But besides the cases of copy-holds, I have another authority to show that complying with the law of England, as nearly as circumstances will allow of, is sufficient. I have in my hand the report of a lowed by a removal from office, it might not be unreasonable to presume that such a consequence would have been distinctly announced. It is not, however, the intention of the court to express any opinion upon this point, because, whatever may be the duty of the proper officer of the government in this respect, it must, we think, be admitted that until the paymaster is recalled, he continues in office. The act authorizes, perhaps requires, his recall, but it does not displace him. The officer whose duty it may be to recall him, acts upon his own responsibility to the government by declining to do so; but, until he acts otherwise, the paymaster is authorized, notwithstanding his delinquency, to receive and to disburse the funds which may be placed in his hands.

The attempt to distinguish this from Kirkpatrick's case, is made upon the ground that 190*] *was purely a case of laches, whereas, in this, an unauthorized act was done by the government in confiding funds to the disposal of a public defaulter, whom the government was bound by law to have dismissed from office. But will it be contended that the obligation to dismiss this officer was more imperative than that imposed upon the comptroller to call the collector of direct taxes to account at the periods prescribed by law, and in cases of delinquency, to pursue the summary remedy which the same law provided for the safety of the public, and, consequentially, for that of the surety? The neglect in the one case, and in the other, imputes laches to the officer whose duty it was to perform the acts which the law required; but, in a legal point of view, the rights of the government cannot be affected by these laches. The provisions in both laws are merely directory to the officers, and intended for the security and protection of government, by insuring punctuality and responsibility; but they form no part of the contract with the surety. If, then, the paymaster continues in office, notwithstanding the omission of the proper officer to recall him on the ground of his defaults, the act of placing funds in his hands to be disbursed according to law is not one of which the surety can complain, since the public interest requires that the troops should be paid, which can be done only by the officer appointed for that purpose. If the neglect of the officers of government, from which the surety suffers, does not discharge him from his responsibility *in either case, it is not [*191 perceived how the placing funds in the hands of the paymaster, who continues in office, can have that effect, seeing that the latter circumstance is the necessary consequence of the former. If the law displaced the officer upon the ground of delinquency, the placing funds in his hands, after his removal from office, could not possibly be upon the responsibility of the surety, inasmuch as his undertaking was for the faithful discharge of the duties of his principal as paymaster, and, consequently, he is not bound for his acts after he has ceased to hold that office. The whole argument of the counsel for the defendant proceeded upon the assumption that the office terminated, ipso facto, as soon as the delinquency occurred, which, we have endeavored to show, presents an incorrect view of the subject.

committee of the Privy Council in the case of Governor Wentworth, who was complained of on various charges. One of these was, that he had set aside grants of land, in the American province of which he was governor, without office, accord-168*] ing to the forms of the law of *England; and the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council, one of whom was Sir Eardly Wilmot, say, in their report, that in some of the American provinces they have not courts so correspondent to those in England as to admit of the same forms, and that, in such cases, if a mode of doing the same thing cy pres is adopted, it ought to be good ex necessitate. See p. 10 of the report. This doctrine is applicable to the present case. The property is entailable, but a common recovery cannot be suffered for want of a proper court, and therefore, ex necessitate, alienation being the only mode of barring the case will admit of, ought to be adjudged sufficient.

"But, if the property is not within the statute De Donis, and yet should be within the statute of wills, it may be material to consider what consequences will follow. Then, under the settlement of 1733, the last Lord Baltimore had a fee-simple conditional, and if a possibility of reverter is not grantable, as Lord Hardwicke holds in Stafford v. Buckley, 2 Ves. Rep. 180, then the possibility of reverter, in this case, did not pass to Mrs. Browning by the will of the father of the last Lord Baltimore, but descended on him, and, for want of an intervening estate, the former merged in the latter. During the life of the father of Lord Frederick, they were distinct; but, after the father's death, they met in the son, and this union gave him the whole fee.

"Lord Mansfield: A possibility of reverter is certainly not grantable.

"Mr. Kenyon: As to the Isle of Man, there is an annotation by Lord Hale in the new edition of Coke upon Littleton, now publishing, which explains the reason why the statutes De Donis of uses, and of wills, do not extend to Man, in a way not applicable to Maryland. Man was a dominion belonging to the King of England before those statutes; and Lord Hale says it was ruled that those statutes do not extend there, because Man was not parcel of the realm of England, and is not specially named. But the grant and settlement of Maryland are subsequent to those statutes. See 20 b. of the new edition of Co. Litt. (*)

"Lord Mansfield: It will be very proper to consider the case of *the Isle of Man in 4 [*169 Inst. and 2 Anderson. Both Maryland and Man are dominions held of the crown of England; and the grant of Man to the Derby family was prior to the statute De Donis, and yet the judges held that it did not extend to it, any more than the statute of uses and wills, which were subsequent. The case of The Duke of Athol and The Bishop of Man should also be considered. Lord Hardwicke took great pains in giving his opinion in that case. He gave me a corrected note of his opinion, and another to The Duke of Athol.

"Mr. Sergeant Hill, in reply: It is agreed, that if the property was in England, the case would be clear against the devisee of Lord Baltimore for want of a recovery; and it has not been shown that a recovery was impossible. The distinction between the land and port duties has not been answered. They were separated by King William. He seized the former, but did not touch the latter. The distinction between sovereignty and mere land is solid. The case from 2 P. Wms. 75, was cited to prove that subjects of the King of England carry over our laws with them into a new settlement; which I do not controvert. A manor is not to be compared with the seigniory of Maryland. The principal powers given to the proprietor of Maryland do not belong to the lord of a manor.

OTIS, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

WALTER, Defendant in Error.

Under the embargo act of the 25th of April, 1808, c. 170 (LXVI.), s. 11, the collector is protected in the honest exercise of his discretion in detaining the vessel, and securing both vessel and cargo, until an actual termination of the voyage.

Whether the voyage has terminated, is a question of fact, and if the voyage be colorably, but not really terminated, the collector may detain the vessel, if he has honest suspicions.

ERROR to the Supreme Judicial Court of the state of Massachusetts.

This is the same cause which was formerly before this court.[1]

It was argued at this term by the Attorney-General and Mr. Blake for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Webster and Mr. Read for the defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is brought up, by writ of error, from the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, for the purpose of reviewing a judgment of that court, given in favor of the defendant here, upon an action of trover instituted in that state, *to recover damages [*193 for the alleged conversion of sundry articles composing the cargo of the sloop Ten Sisters. Otis, in the capacity of collector of the district of Barnstable, had, in the year 1808, seized and detained the vessel and cargo under the provisions of the embargo act of the 25th of April in that year.

This is the third time that this cause has been brought to the notice of this court. In the two former instances, it came up upon bills of exceptions, and in both the decisions of that court were reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded. In the present instance, a special verdict has been taken, and as the law was settled in the two former decisions, that until the termination of the voyage the collector was protected in the honest exercise of an unlimited discretion in detaining the vessel, and, by necessary consequence, in resorting to the ordinary and necessary means of securing and preserving both vessel and cargo, this verdict seems to be drawn up with a view to bring up the single question, whether, in the sense of the laws of Congress, and of the decisions of this court, this voyage was not, in effect, terminated before the seizure.

The special verdict finds that the vessel cleared out "for the port of Yarmouth." It is

1.—Vide ante, S. C., Vol. II., p. 18; Vol. VI., p. 583.

"The word 'assigns' is necessary to make offices of trust transferrable; and the reason for omitting it in some parts of the Maryland charter, was to make some parts of the property unalienable. It is omitted in the grant of the seigniory. It is said that kingdoms are devisable; but there is no instance of the devise of a dependent kingdom. I say this on the authority of Craig. Henry the VIII., and Elizabeth, had acts of parliament.

"Lord Mansfield: By the feudal law, land was not devisable; much less a kingdom; though William the Conqueror claimed England under a will.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill: It is said that recoveries on writs of right in manor courts, have only been in the case of copy-holds, and of lands in ancient demesne. But, in the cases I cited from Benloe and Robinson, of recoveries in the Courts of Baron Ris-170*] ing and Wolverhampton, *the recoveries were of freehold land, and the words secundum consuetudinem manerii, which are used where the recovery is of copy-hold, or ancient demesne, are not mentioned. The argument from the entails of copy-holds, which are barrable by surrenders, supposes that there is no custom to warrant another mode; but the argument of necessity fails here, for there is another mode. I give the same answer to the cy pres doctrine in the report to the Privy Council in Governor Wentworth's case.

"Lord Mansfield: The questions in this case are new, and of great difficulty. I have often considered them. I do not know of any litigated case before the present, in which the question has been, whether a seigniory like that of Maryland can be aliened or devised. Both the Baltimore and Penn families have made their proprietorships the subjects of settlements and entails. As to the statute of William and Mary, it is strange that it should restrain from selling lands or proprieties to aliens; because, before that statute, they were incapable of purchasing. But, still, the words of the statute, which mention any right or propriety in any island or tract of land in America, by charter, or letters patent furnish some argument in the case of Penn and Baltimore, the question of alienation could not arise. There the suit was about an agreement as to the bounds of two provinces; and it is certain, that a province cannot be dismembered by aliening one part so as to be holden of another province. Something might be incidentally said as to the point of alienation, but there could be no solemn adjudication, for the case did not require it. The jurisdictions and powers granted by the Maryland charter, are larger than those in any other. Doubts may arise as to the principality, from the nature of the property. Taking in execution, and other consequences of its being subject to alienation, may furnish strong reasons of policy against the power of alienating. The law being settled as to the principality, a secondary question will be, whether the lands or port duties can be severed from it. The rule of applying to America all the laws of England, in force at the time of settling a colony, is subject to many qualifications. The statute of charitable uses doth not extend to Antigua. There may be a difference, too, between the seigniory and proprietorship of Maryland, and other estates here. The seigniory and proprietorship passed under the great seal, and that carries the law of England. Another *thing quite new, is the question as to bar- [*171 ring the entail. The history of barring entails in the provinces is material. If there had not been provincial laws to regulate the barring of entails, it might have been proper to have supported the mode of barring by fines and recoveries in England. The necessity of the case might, perhaps, have justified it. But the provincial laws do not apply to the seigniory and proprietorship of Maryland. The question as to them is entirely new, and of great difficulty. The pains taken to show that a recovery might have been suffered in the Court of the Castle of Windsor, proves the force of the argument of necessity as to barring by alienation. The case of descendible freeholds, the entails of which are barred in that way, may have influence on the present case.

"The case was ordered to stand for argument a second time next Michaelmas term; and Lord Mansfield said that, probably, several arguments would be necessary."

true, the captain, in the oath attached to his manifest, makes use of the mere indefinite expression "bound for Yarmouth." But, when we come to examine the sense in which he made this oath, by referring to his instruc-194*] tions, which are also *found by the verdict, we find it restricted to a voyage to Bass River, where it was to terminate by landing his cargo, and storing it in a particular warehouse. This, then, was the point of his destination, call it port, harbor, place, or what we will. And, as the collector uses the definite, instead of the indefinite article, before port, in the clearance, the fair inference is, that the clearance was for Bass River, under the designation of "the port of Yarmouth."

We are far, however, from intending to intimate that if the captain's oath as to his destination could not be modified and explained by reference to his instructions, it might be permitted to enlarge the meaning of the word port as used in the clearance, so as to embrace the township of Yarmouth. In those times, when it behooved every public officer to be on the alert against the multiplied evasions of the system of that day, it is not to be supposed that the definite language of the clearance was adopted without an object. The captain appears to have acted as if he had received a clearance on a general voyage to Yarmouth, whereas, it is obvious that the collector of Ipswich acted under a sense of the impropriety of giving a clearance that would leave the terminus of the voyage so void of precision. We consider the definite article as having been used for a definite purpose, and to preclude the general privilege of sailing to any point in the town or township of Yarmouth, at which a landing might have been affected.

It is obvious, indeed, from the whole tenor
195*] of *the verdict, that the mouth of Bass River is understood more emphatically to be the port of Yarmouth than any other place in the township of Yarmouth. In one place it finds, "that the harbor or port of Barnstable is about three miles from the harbor of Yarmouth;" in another, that a long point of land intervenes between "Yarmouth harbor or Bass River harbor, and Hyanis or Barnstable harbor;" in both instances drawing an express discrimination between Yarmouth harbor, to which the vessel was bound (taking the term to be the synonym of port), and Hyanis, or Barnstable harbor, in which she was seized.

Everything proves that Bass River harbor was the original destination of the vessel. In this sense, it cannot be denied that Bass River harbor was the port to which, in the language of the law, she was "ostensibly bound." No one contends that when at her anchorage in Hyanis Bay, where she was seized, she could be considered as arrived at Bass River harbor. It was ten miles from this harbor—a peninsula intervening—and, as the verdict finds, the vessel had gone to Hyanis Bay after being compelled, by head winds, to pass Bass River.

But, it is contended, that as her clearance was not specified to Bass River harbor, but to the port of Yarmouth, an arrival at Gage's wharf would as well have satisfied the exigencies of her case; that, in fact, she had arrived there when anchored where she was seized, and that, having then a right to demand her permit to land, and *having demanded it, [*196 the circumstances make out a termination of the voyage as effectually as if she had put in to Bass River.

We have already stated, we think, sufficient reasons for not admitting that the clearance could be satisfied by a destination to Gage's wharf. Yet, it cannot be denied that there is one part of the special verdict that does throw some obscurity over this part of the case. It is that in which the jury finds in these words: "That, in the practice of the custom-house for Barnstable, and of the owners and masters of vessels belonging to Barnstable district, Yarmouth and Barnstable are considered one and the same port; and that Gage's wharf, at the head of Lewis' Bay, is a place in Yarmouth, at which vessels bound to that port frequently unload, and that no difference is made in the custom-house between Yarmouth and Barnstable, or Hyanis, as to the entry of vessels that have arrived at either place."

If, in this passage of the verdict, the jury meant to find that a vessel arriving in Hyanis Roads, an open roadstead, not locked in by any head lands that could make a port of it, had, in fact, arrived at Gage's wharf, or Bass River, they should have been explicit; and, absurd and repugnant to the geography of the country and the common sense of mankind as the fact would have been, we must have submitted to it, or refused to act upon it. As it is, we can only draw such inferences as the finding will sanction. And we are free to confess that we cannot understand what is meant by a practice of the custom-house *and ship-masters [*197 of Barnstable, which confounds the open roadstead of Hyanis with the harbor of Bass River, or even the landing place at Gage's wharf, the one ten, the other three miles off. We can very readily conceive why the landing place at Gage's wharf should be indifferently called Falmouth or Barnstable, since it is in the town by one name, and the landing place of the port or bay of the other name, the line crossing the bay but a few feet from the wharf. To arrive, therefore, at Barnstable harbor, or Lewis' Bay or Hyanis Roads, which seem to be somehow confounded in this verdict, and to arrive at the township of Yarmouth, at Gage's wharf, may be considered as one and the same thing. And yet the inference from that fact may be directly the reverse of that insisted on for the defendant in error. For the finding is clear and positive, which distinguishes between Barnstable harbor and Yarmouth harbor; and if, then, Barnstable harbor be identified with the landing-place as Gage's wharf, the conclusion is unavoidable that the port of Yarmouth cannot mean the landing place at Gage's wharf. Indeed, it is impossible to arrive at the conclusion that the destination of this vessel was indifferently to Gage's wharf or Bass River without permitting a mere inference, and that, too, from equivocal terms, to conflict with a positive finding of the jury couched in the most explicit terms. And even when advanced that far, it would still remain for the defendant here to maintain that a vessel at anchor in Hyanis Road had completed her *voyage to Gage's wharf: a proposi- [*198 tion as wide of the fact with reference to the topography of the country as it is of the intendment of law or the finding of the jury. For the words of the special verdict are, "that the vessel when seized lay at anchor in the harbor or port of Barnstable, above half a mile from the shore or beach, and about three miles from the harbor of Yarmouth." That the jury did not intend to confound Gage's wharf with the harbor of Yarmouth is distinctly shown by the words that follow the above, declaring Gage's wharf to be six miles and a half from where the vessel was seized. Whether the jury were right or wrong in fixing these distances, the inference we deduce from it is still the same, to wit, that the harbor of Yarmouth and Gage's wharf could not be one, no more than the port of Barnstable and the harbor of Yarmouth. The vessel lay in the former, three miles distant from the latter, and six and a half from Gage's wharf.

Upon the whole, we can discover nothing in this case to induce us to alter the opinion entertained in the two former, that the vessel had not reached the terminus of her voyage, that she was in itinere, and therefore liable to seizure. On the subject of the argument deduced from the demand of the permit to land, we think this also was fully answered and disposed of in the former decisions of this court in the same suit. We are therefore of opinion that the act on which the collector relies, justified the seizure; that there is error in the judgment of the court of Massachusetts; that 199*] *it must be reversed, and a judgment entered for the plaintiff here, the defendant in the original suit.

[Statute of Frauds. Evidence.]

HINDE'S LESSEE v. LONGWORTH.

Question as to the sufficiency of a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed at lands in Ohio.

In examining the admissibility of testimony in the court above, the party excepting is to be confined to the specific objection taken at the trial.

Where a voluntary deed is impeached as fraudulent, evidence of judgments against the grantor is admissible as proof (among other facts) that he was indebted at the time of making the deed, although the grantee was not a party to the suits on which the judgments were obtained.

A voluntary deed is void as to antecedent, but not as to subsequent creditors.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Ohio.

This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error, to recover the possession of the premises in the cause, described as in lot No. 107 in the town of Cincinnati. It appeared in evidence at the trial, that on the 28th of March, 1799, Thomas Doyle, Sen., under whom both parties derived title, was seized and possessed of the lot in question. The lessor of the plaintiff claimed under a deed 200*] of that date from Thomas *Doyle, Sen., to his son Thomas; and the defendant set up a title under a judgment against Doyle the elder, at the suit of John Graff, entered at the August term, 1799, of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hamilton. At the trial, three bills of exceptions were taken by the lessor of the plaintiff.

The first bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiff in support of his action offered in evidence the deed from Doyle, Sen., to his son, to the reading of which in evidence the defendant objected, and the court rejected it, as not being properly acknowledged. The certificate of acknowledgment was as follows: "Hamilton, ss.: Personally before me, Thomas Gibson, one of the justices of the Court of Common Pleas for said county, the above-named Thomas Doyle and —— Doyle, his wife, who, being examined separate and apart, acknowledged the foregoing deed to be her hand and seal, free act and deed, for the uses and purposes mentioned." Thomas Doyle only had signed the deed. His wife was not named as a party to the conveyance except in the conclusion of the deed, as follows:

"In witness whereof the said Thomas Doyle and — Doyle, his wife, who hereby relinquishes her right of dower in the premises, have hereto set their hands and affixed their seals, the day and year first above written." A seal was affixed to the deed, but no signature of the wife.

In the second bill of exceptions, the counsel for the plaintiff stated that he claimed title under the same deed mentioned in the first exception *by virtue of which Doyle the [*201 younger became seized of the premises in question, which had descended to the wife of the lessor of the plaintiff, to which facts he adduced proof to the jury. The bill of exceptions then proceeds to state that the defendant, in order to prove that the deed was made with intent to defraud creditors, having read certain depositions to establish that fact, offered in evidence the records of two judgments recovered against Doyle the elder, one at the suit of John Graff, at the August term, 1799, of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hamilton, for upwards of $900; and the other in favor of Edward Shoemaker, at the October term, 1800, of the same court, for $590. To which testimony the plaintiff objected, as incompetent evidence, upon the ground that the proceedings in said suits had taken place between other persons than himself and Doyle, Jun., and to which he was not a party. The objection was overruled by the court, and the testimony admitted.

The third bill of exceptions stated that after the admission of the evidence aforesaid (the judgment records), and in order to repel the presumption of fraud in Doyle the elder, and to show that he had no intention to defraud creditors by making the said deed, but to prove that Doyle the younger, then an infant, was the creditor of his father, the plaintiff offered in evidence the depositions of certain witnesses. The bill of exceptions then proceeded to state that the depositions were offered to rebut the evidence *of fraud in fact, [*202 and the evidence of a fraudulent intent in the grantor; but the court declared their opinion to be that the last-mentioned evidence offered for rebutting the charge of fraud was inadmissible, and rejected the whole of the evidence so offered.

Upon these exceptions, a verdict and judgment having been entered for the defendant in the court below, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Scott for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Webster and Mr. Hammond for the defendant.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended,

1. That the court below erred in rejecting the evidence stated in the first bill of exceptions, of the acknowledgment of the deed from Doyle, Sen.[1]

2. That there was error in admitting the evidence offered by the defendant, as stated in the second bill of exceptions, to impeach the deed for fraud. It was not fraudulent at common law prior to the statute 13 Eliz., c. 5,[2] and that statute had never been adopted in Ohio.[3]

203*] 3. The evidence stated in the third bill of exceptions was erroneously rejected, even supposing the statute 13 Eliz., c. 5, to be in force in the states which formed the territory north-west of the river Ohio. The statute 27 Eliz., c. 4, is construed more strongly in favor of purchasers, than that of 13 Eliz. c. 5, in favor of creditors. A mere voluntary conveyance, under the last-mentioned statute, is only presumptive evidence of an intention to defraud creditors, and may be rebutted by countervailing testimony.[4] The authorities make a distinction between a conveyance to a stranger, and a conveyance to a child, for maintenance and advancement. The latter is not considered as voluntary.[5] It is necessary to prove that the grantor was indebted at the time of making the conveyance.[6] A voluntary settlement by a trader, who afterwards becomes bankrupt, is good against all subsequent creditors under the statute of Eliz., although it is void under the bankrupt laws.[7] Besides, there was, in this case, evidence that the grantee was the creditor of the grantor, his father; so that, though he was then an infant, 204] the conveyance was not *voluntary, but for a valuable consideration.[8] If it should be objected, that the evidence offered was contrary to the consideration expressed in the deed, the answer is, that the party may aver and prove a consideration different from that expressed in the conveyance, if it be consistent with that expressed.[9] And courts will uphold settlements made upon fair and bona fide inducements, by every reasonable presumption in their favor.[10]

On the part of the defendant, it was insisted,

That the statutes of frauds had been practically adopted in Ohio, by the Governor and judges, under the provision of the ordinance of Congress of 1787.[11] To adopt them by reference, without reciting them at large, has been the usual mode of adopting and publishing the English statutes which formed parts of the "laws of the original states." The common law itself is in force only by virtue of the same adoption. The statutes of frauds having been heretofore generally acted upon, and considered as in force, the validity of their adoption and promulgation having never been doubted, ought not now to be drawn in question. The construction of the statute as to voluntary conveyances has been settled by this court. It applies as well to cases where the conveyance was made in contemplation *of creating a debt, immediately after- [*205 wards contracted, as of debts actually existing at the time.[12] But here, copies of the accounts, upon which the judgments were recovered, are spread upon the record, by which it appears that the causes of action on the part of the creditors of the grantor arose before the date of the deed. The deed itself distinctly stating the consideration upon which it was made, proof of a different consideration was inadmissible.[13] If the deed was not properly acknowledged and recorded, it was not notice to the party claiming against it.[14] The records of the judgments were admissible in evidence to impeach the validity of the deed, as showing, among other facts, that the grantor was indebted at the time it was executed. The maxim of res inter alios acta could not be applicable to this testimony, any more than to other evidence of the grantor being indebted at the time.

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court:

The premises in question in this cause are described as in lot No. 107 in the town of Cincinnati; and it is admitted on the record that on the 28th day of March, 1799, Thomas Doyle, Sen., was seized and in possession of this lot. Both *parties derive title under him. [*206 The lessor of the plaintiff claims under a deed of the date above mentioned, from Thomas Doyle, Sen., to his son Thomas. And the defendant sets up a title under a judgment against Doyle the elder, in favor of John Graff, entered in August, 1799. Upon the trial, the validity of the deed from Doyle the elder to his son was the main subject of inquiry. Three bills of exception were taken on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff, and a verdict entered by consent for the defendant, and the case is brought here by writ of error to the Circuit Court for the district of Ohio.

1. The first bill of exceptions relates to the acknowledgment of the deed from Doyle the elder to his son. This was deemed by the court insufficient, and the deed rejected. In the second bill of exceptions, however, the counsel for the plaintiff stated again that he claimed title under the same deed mentioned in the first exception, by virtue of which Doyle the younger became seized in fee of the premises in question, and which had descended to the wife of the lessor of the plaintiff, to which facts he adduced proof, which was submitted to the jury, and to which proof no objection appears to have been made on the part of the defendant. What that proof was is not stated, but we must presume it to have been enough to prove the due execution of the deed, both because it does not appear to have been objected to, and because the defendant went into evidence to show the deed was fraudulent and void, which would have been altogether ir-207*] relevant *if the deed had not been sufficiently proved to be submitted to the jury. This might supersede the necessity of this court expressing any opinion upon the sufficiency of the acknowledgment of the deed; because, admitting the court below erred in rejecting it in the first instance, still, as it was afterwards, in the progress of the cause, duly proved, the judgment would not be reversed on account of that error if this was the only question in the cause.

We notice this point only to correct what we consider a misapprehension of the plaintiff's counsel as to the practice in cases of this kind. But, as this cause must be sent back to another trial, it is deemed advisable to express an opinion upon the sufficiency of this acknowledgment, the certificate of which is as follows: "Hamilton, ss.: Personally before me, Thomas Gibson, one of the justices of the Court of Common Pleas for said county, the above-named Thomas Doyle, and ——— Doyle, his wife, who, being examined separate and apart, acknowledged the foregoing deed to be her hand and seal, free act and deed, for the uses and purposes mentioned." The question is, whether this can be taken for acknowledgment of Thomas Doyle. He only has signed the deed. His wife is not named as a party in any manner, except in the conclusion, which is as follows: "In witness whereof, the said Thomas Doyle, and — Doyle, his wife, who hereby relinquishes her right of dower in the premises, have hereto severally set their hands, and affixed their seals, the day and 208*] year first *above written." A seal is affixed to the deed, but no signature.

The certificate is insufficient unless it contains enough to show, with all reasonable certainty, that, in point of fact, Thomas Doyle did appear before the officer and acknowledge the deed. And this, we think, it does not show. It does not even state expressly that Thomas Doyle appeared before the officer; but if that is to be inferred, the purpose for which he appeared is not stated, so that nothing can be inferred from the mere fact of appearance. It does not set forth that he, in point of fact, did acknowledge the deed, or did any one act that might by possibility be construed into an acknowledgment. The certificate does state that the wife did acknowledge the deed, which, if true, necessarily implies that she appeared before the magistrate, although that fact is not stated. The form of the certificate is adapted to the acknowledgment of the wife. It states that being examined separate and apart, she acknowledged the deed to be her hand and seal, free act and deed. The relinquishment of dower, and the affixing of the seal, show that she was intended to be made a party; and if the court was at liberty to conjecture, or indulge any intendment about the real fact, it would be as reasonable, if not more so, to infer that the wife did appear, and make the acknowledgment certified, and by mistake omitted to sign the deed, than that the husband acknowledged it. But the certificate of acknowledgment ought not to be left in such uncertainty. It is ex-parte proof *of [*209 the deed; and it ought to appear with all reasonable certainty that the requisites of the law had been complied with. The deed was therefore properly rejected in the first instance.

2. The second bill of exceptions necessarily presupposes that the deed was in evidence before the jury. For it states that the defendant, in order to prove that the deed was made with intent to defraud creditors, and therefore void, having read some depositions to prove that fact, offered in evidence the records of two judgments recovered against Doyle the elder; one in favor of John Graff, on the first Tuesday in August, 1799, for upwards of $900, and the other in favor of Edward Shoemaker, in October term, 1800, for about $500. To the admission of which the plaintiff's counsel objected as incompetent evidence, on the ground that these were proceedings inter alios, to which Doyle the younger was in no wise a party. The objection was overruled, and the evidence admitted.

It will be perceived that the objection to the evidence was specifically placed on the ground that Doyle the younger was not a party to the judgments. And it may well be questioned, whether, when the purpose for which the evidence is offered is specifically avowed, the court will look at it in any other point of view, or inquire whether it might not be proper for some other purpose. As a general rule, we think the party ought to be confined, in examining the admissibility *of evidence, to [*210 the specific objection taken to it. The attention of the court is called to the testimony in that point of view only; and to admit an inquiry afterwards, whether the evidence might not have been admissible for some other purpose, would be sanctioning a course of practice calculated to mislead.

It is unnecessary, however, in this case, to put the question on that ground, for the evidence was admissible in whatever light the objection is taken.

The consideration expressed in the deed from Doyle the elder to his son, is natural love and affection, and the judgments were introduced to show that the grantor was in debt at the time of giving the deed, which, as was contended, would render it void as against creditors. This was therefore, necessarily, an inquiry into matters to which the grantee in the deed was not a party. It was certainly competent for the defendant to show that the grantor was indebted at the time he made the conveyance; this was a necessary step towards establishing the fraud; and if these judgments conduced to prove that fact, they could not be shut out as incompetent evidence. The extent and effect of the evidence was matter for the jury. If the evidence ought to have been excluded because Doyle the younger was not a party to the judgments, the same objection would have tain against the proof of his being in debt to others in any manner whatever; that would have been equally an inquiry into matters to which the grantee in the deed was not a 211*] party. There *was, therefore, no objection to the evidence on this ground.

The judgments appear to have been entered some short time after the date of the deed, and it is said that a voluntary deed is void only as to antecedent, and not subsequent creditors, unless made with a fraudulent intent; and this appears to be the doctrine of this court, as laid down in Sexton v. Wheaton (8 Wheat. Rep., 242), after a review of the leading authorities on this question. But copies of the accounts upon which the judgments were founded are spread upon the record, by which it appears that the cause of action arose before the date of the deed. If these accounts did not properly form a part of the record, according to the course and practice of the court where the judgments were entered, a specific objection should have been made to their being received in evidence, which would have led to the inquiry whether they properly formed a part of the record; but, as the question is now presented to this court, we cannot say that these accounts are to be stricken out of the record. They may be looked to for the purpose of showing that Doyle the elder was in debt at the date of the deed; but, whether to an extent which would avoid the deed, must depend on circumstances which are not to be inquired into by this court. There was no error, therefore, in the admission of the evidence.

3. The third exception arises on the rejection of certain depositions offered in evidence on the part of the plaintiff. The introductory part of 212*] *the bill of exceptions sets out "that after the admission of the evidence aforesaid (the judgment records), and in order to repel the presumption of fraud in Doyle the elder, and that he had no intention to defraud creditors by making the said deed, but to prove that Doyle the younger was the creditor of his father, the evidence was offered.

The concluding part of the bill of exceptions alleges that the depositions were offered to rebut the evidence of fraud in fact, and the evidence of a fraudulent intent in the grantor, Doyle the elder. But the court declared their opinion to be, that the last-mentioned evidence, offered for rebutting the charge of fraud, was inadmissible, and rejected the whole of the said evidence so offered.

Looking, then, as we must, to the whole bill of exceptions, to collect its true meaning and import, we must understand the evidence to have been offered for the double purpose of showing that Doyle the younger was a creditor of his father, and that by reason thereof, although the consideration in the deed purported to be natural love and affection, it could not be considered as given with intention to defraud creditors; and also to rebut the evidence of fraud in fact, and to show the character and situation of Doyle the elder in point of property, at the time he executed the deed in question.

If the testimony offered was admissible for either of the purposes above stated, the court erred in rejecting it.

213*] *That the evidence was proper for the latter purpose, cannot be questioned. The charge against the grantor was, that he was guilty of fraud in fact in making the deed to his son; that it was done for the express purpose of defrauding his creditors; and it was proper evidence, therefore, to rebut this allegation, to show that the grantor had the means of paying his debts independent of the property conveyed to his son. Whether the evidence would have made out that fact to the satisfaction of the jury, is not for this court to inquire. If it conduced to make out that fact, it should have been submitted to the consideration of the jury. A deed from a parent to a child, for the consideration of love and affection, is not absolutely void as against creditors. It may be so under certain circumstances; but the mere fact of being in debt to a small amount would not make the deed fraudulent, if it could be shown that the grantor was in prosperous circumstances, and unembarrassed, and that the gift to the child was a reasonable provision according to his state and condition in life, and leaving enough for the payment of the debts of the grantor. The want of a valuable consideration may be a badge of fraud, but it is only presumptive, and not conclusive evidence of it, and may be met and rebutted by evidence on the other side. The evidence offered to show that Doyle the elder was indebted to his son to an amount equal to the value of the property conveyed to him, was declared also to be for the purpose of repelling the presumption *of fraud in [*214 fact, and to show that there could have been no such intention to defraud his creditors, by putting his property out of their reach, without receiving any real and adequate consideration for it. Doyle the elder might have sold the land to his son, or to a stranger, for a valuable consideration, and given a good title for the same, although his debts might have been double in amount to the value of his property, unless his creditors had acquired a lien upon it. It would have been no fraud in judgment of law against his creditors, for him to have paid one, and left the others unpaid. Had the evidence been offered for the purpose of showing that the deed was given, for a valuable consideration, and in satisfaction of the debt due from the father to the son, and not for the consideration of love and affection, as expressed in the deed, it might well be considered as contradicting the deed. It would then be substituting a valuable for a good consideration, and a violation of the well-settled rule of law, that parol evidence is inadmissible to annul, or substantially vary, a written agreement.

But that was not the object for which the evidence was offered, or the effect it was intended it should have. It could not, in any respect, vary or alter the deed, or give to it a different construction or operation between the parties to it. The defendant had attempted to invalidate the deed by going into proof of circumstances out of the instrument itself and unconnected with it, and which circumstances, it was contended, *showed a fraudulent intention [*215 in the grantor, in conveying the lot in question to his son. And the evidence of the father's being indebted to the son, was to meet, and repel, the presumption of fraud which was attempted to be raised against the deed by reason of such extrinsic circumstances. The evidence which has been admitted to show the fraud, and that which was offered to rebut it, related to collateral and independent facts unconnected with the deed, and could not, therefore, in any manner, vary or alter its terms.

The third exception was, accordingly, well taken. The judgment of the court below must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to issue a venire de novo.

[Local Law.]

LITTLEPAGE v. FOWLER et al.

The following entry is invalid, for want of that certainty and precision which the local laws and decisions require: "January 27, 1783, J. C. L. enters 20,000 acres of land on twenty treasury warrants, No. 8859, etc., beginning at the mouth of a creek falling into the main fork of Licking, on the north side, below some cedar cliffs, and about 35 mile above the Upper Blue Licks, and running from said beginning up the north side of Licking, and bounding with the same as far as will amount to ten miles when reduced to a straight line; thence extending from each end of said reduced line, a northerly course at right angles to the same for quantity."

216*] *THIS cause was argued by Mr. Bibb for the appellant,[1] and by Mr. Talbot for the respondent.[2]

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes up by appeal from the Circuit Court of Kentucky, in which the appellant filed his bill to compel the defendants to convey to him 20,000 acres of land in right of a prior entry. The defendants, having obtained the prior patent, relied upon their prior legal rights; and on the hearing below the bill was dismissed. The entry on which the complainants relied was in these words:

"January 27, 1783. John Carter Littlepage enters 20,000 acres of land on twenty treasury warrants, No. 8859, etc., beginning at the mouth of a creek falling into the main fork of Licking, on the north side below some cedar 217*] cliffs, and *about thirty-five miles above the Upper Blue Lick, and running from said beginning up the north side of Licking, and bending with the same, as far as will amount to ten miles when reduced to a straight line; thence extending from each end of said reduced line in a northwardly course at right angles to the same for quantity."

The only question in the cause is, whether this entry contains that legal precision which the land laws of Kentucky require to make an entry a valid appropriation of the land. For the defendants, it is contended that it is vague, and calculated either to mislead a subsequent locator, or impose upon him an unreasonable labor in the effort to identify it.

On this subject the rule of the law of that state, and the rule of reason, is, that the objects called for to designate the land appropriated should be specific; and, if not notorious in themselves, that they should be so indicated with reference to those which are notorious, as to enable a subsequent locator to discover and identify them by using ordinary diligence.

The locative calls in this cause are, a creek emptying into the main fork of Licking on the north side, below some cedar cliffs. It is not pretended that these objects have the attribute of notoriety, and, in order to lead to their discovery, the subsequent locator is referred to the main branch of Licking River, and the Upper Blue Lick, which are notorious, and to the position and distance of the beginning point of the entry, with reference to the lick and the river.

*A subsequent locator, then, having [*218 this entry in his hand, and proposing to appropriate the adjacent residuum, proceeds to the lick as his starting point; when there, he knows that the land lies above him with reference to the river, upon the river bank, and, in the language of the entry, "about thirty-five miles above the Upper Blue Lick."

The first question which then occurs, to him, is that which has constituted the principal subject of argument in this cause. Upon what principle is the distance here called for to be computed? For the appellant, it is contended that he should pursue the meanders of the river, or the most practicable route by land; for the appellee, that he must apply the mathematical principle to the entry, and take the shortest line that can be drawn between the two points; and both contend that they are sustained by adjudicated cases.

We have examined those causes, and are satisfied that neither party is supported in his doctrine as a universal principle; but that the courts of Kentucky, with that good sense which uniformly distinguishes their efforts to extricate themselves from that chaos of rights in which political relations, and inveterate practice, had involved them, have left each case to be governed by its own merits, wherever distance has been resorted to as the means of identifying a locative call. And certainly the sense in which the enterer uses the reference to distance, is the only general rule that can govern a court in construing *an entry. That [*219 sense may be gathered from his language, or inferred from the habits of men, and the state of the country; but, as he is responsible for the sufficiency of his entry, it would be unfair to impose an arbitrary and unusual meaning upon the language of unlettered men, exploring a country covered with thickets, and replete with dangers.

For these reasons, the straight line, as the means of ascertaining a locative call, has certainly been rejected as a general rule. Such was the case in Hite v. Graham et al. 2 Bibb, Rep. 155, 145; M'Kee v. Bodley, 2 Bibb.

1.—He cited Pannel v. Johnson, 2 Wheat. Rep. 211; Hite v. Graham, 2 Bibb, Rep. 143; White v. Wilson, 3 Bibb, Rep. 542; Whitaker v. Hall, 1 Bibb. Rep. 79; Bodley v. Taylor, 5 Cranch's Rep. 224; M'Gee v. Thompson, 1 Bibb. Rep. 132; Marshall v. Currie, 4 Cranch's Rep. 176, 177; Bush v. Todd, 1 Bibb, Rep. 64; Whitaker v. Hale, Id. 73; Roberts v. Huff, Hardin's Rep. 382; Taylor v. Kincaid, Id. 82; Bowman v. Mellin, 3 Bibb, Rep. 153.

2.—He cited Hite v. Graham, 2 Bibb, Rep. 144; M'Gee v. Bodley, 2 Bibb, Rep. 482; Whitaker v. Hale, 1 Bibb. Rep. 79; Craig v. Hawkins, 1 Bibb. Rep. 53; Smith v. Walton, 3 Bibb, Rep. 153; Carland v. Rowland, Id. 127; Webb v. Bedford, 2 Bibb, Rep. 259; Greenup v. Lyne, Id. 37; Mercer v. Irvins, Id. 471; Landrum v. Hite, 1 Marsh. Kentucky Rep. 419; Bartas v. Calhoun, 2 Marsh. Kentucky Rep. 169.

Rep. 482; Whitaker v. Hale et al. 1 Bibb, Rep. 79. As the method of surveying an entry, however, the meanders of a river are always reduced to a straight line, and to this class of cases are all those quoted for the appellee to be referred. Craig v. Hawkins' Heirs, 1 Bibb, Rep. 53, and many others. Yet, in the case of M'Kee v. Bodley, before cited, both the direction and admeasurement of a straight line are resorted to for the purpose of verifying a call lying on the side of a road. And the reason is obvious; in that case, the shortness of the line, as well as the phraseology of the entry, rendered it admissible that the enterer referred to distance as ascertained by direct measurement.

One general rule is never departed from, to wit, that when distance is indicated by a road, it shall be held to mean by the meanders of the road. Whitaker v. Hale, supra and passim. So, also, where there is no road or trace, the 220*] most *usual route, if there be proved such a route to exist, seems to be the rule. So it is laid down in Hite v. Graham et al. in which, also, the general rule as to the sense in which the language of entries is to be received, is explicitly declared to be "according to the popular acceptation at the time when the entry was made." And, although, in the case of White v. Wilson, 3 Bibb, Rep. 542, a learned judge is reported to have said "that there seems to be a diversity of opinion as to the most natural construction of a locative call in an entry where a given distance, up or down a water-course, is specified," we cannot but think, that the same rules which govern the cases on the subject of distances by land, have been distinctly and rationally applied to distances called for with reference to water-courses.

Distances on the Ohio are invariably measured according to its meanders. Hite v. Graham, 2 Bibb, Rep. 143; Johnson v. Pannel's Heirs, 2 Wheat. Rep. 207. Nor is there anything arbitrary in the rule, nor leading to a result so indefinite as the supposed distinction between great and small water-courses. Their navigable character furnishes the rule by identifying them with highways, and thus the popular acceptation of terms still furnishes the distinction. This is very obvious from the case of Hite v. Graham, in which the court say, "as the Ohio is the usual way of passing from one point on it to another, and was, at an early day, the great highway of coming to that part of this country," etc. And, in the same case, 221*] speaking of the Little *Sandy, the court observes, "this call, like that for distance on the Ohio, is not explicit as to computing it. But this stream, though like the Ohio navigable, is not like it impassable, except occasionally; and a person, in passing from one point of it to another, is not necessarily confined to the winding of the stream. A direct line, however, would be impracticable to travel and use, put it out of the question as being a way in which a call of this kind would ever be understood by anyone." And thus, in the case of Bowman v. Melton, 2 Bibb, Rep. 153, where the call was for thirteen or fourteen miles up a small stream, the court observed, "it, indeed, is not probable that the distance along the meanders of the water-course was intended, because it is believed that it never was usual to travel with the meanders of a small stream to ascertain the distance of one object from another; nor is it probable that the distance by a direct line was intended, because it would extend beyond the head of the water-course. But it is rather to be presumed that reputed distance was meant."

Since, then, all the testimony goes to establish that Licking, above the Upper Blue Lick, is not a navigable stream, at least not so as to be resorted to as a highway, especially for ascending navigation, it follows that the inquiries of a subsequent locater, who wished to appropriate the residuum adjacent to this entry, or of the surveyor who had a warrant to survey it, would be for a creek entering into Licking on the *north side, at a distance from [*222 the lick of about thirty-five miles, by some practicable route. The answer to this inquiry, as appears from the evidence, would direct him immediate to the fork of Licking. For Morrow, one of the witnesses, swears that he could reach that point by traveling in a practicable route about thirty-five or forty miles (p. 486 of the record), and in a direct line it is ascertained to be about thirty miles. Nor would the call for the cedar cliffs be wanting here, for it is worthy of remark, that the call is not for a cliff adjoining, or near to, or in sight of, the mouth of the creek, but merely for a cliff at an indefinite distance above the mouth of the creek. Whereas all the witnesses who are examined to identify the mouth of Foxe's creek, where this entry is claimed to lie, answer under the impression that the cliff is to be immediately above or adjoining the mouth of the creek. In this particular, there is much reason to believe that Foxe's creek stands alone on the north side of Licking; but the call is vague and indefinite on this point, since it is answered, if the creek is below the cliffs at any reasonable distance.

We will now suppose the locator dissatisfied, or in doubt, with regard to the object thus found, and, returning to the lick, resolved to renew his researches. The idea of finding the mouth of Foxe's creek, by following a direct line, is out of the case, since no course is furnished him by the entry on which to pursue his researches for this object. He must, then, either renew his inquiries *for some [*223 other creek of the description called for, or, adopting the meanders of the river as his guide, pursue his way up its margin.

In answer to his inquiries, it is obvious that any creek lying between the north fork of Licking and Foxe's creek would be recommended to his examination in preference to Foxe's; because the latter must be farther removed from the distance of thirty-five miles than any one lying above it. If, then, the enterer intended to appropriate his land at the mouth of Foxe's creek, it is obvious that his call for distance is calculated to mislead, not to direct, a subsequent locator.

But, as there is no evidence in the cause, of any road, trace or explored route, leading from the lick to the mouth of any of these creeks, let us suppose the explorer at liberty to take the course contended for in behalf of the appellant, and to thread his way up the meanders of the river. When he reaches the mouth of Foxe's creek, he finds himself short of the distance called for by more than one-third of the whole, that is to say, by eleven miles. Does the cause afford any ground, or the cases any principle, which will authorize his stopping there?

The call is for a creek "about thirty-five miles" above the lick. We are not disposed to restrict the appellant to the rigid rule formerly laid down by the courts, by which the word "about" was rejected, and the entry limited to the number called for. In surveying entries, there is little doubt that this is the rule; but in 224*] *measuring distances, a more liberal rule is laid down in the more modern case of Jones v. Plummer, of which we are disposed to allow the party the full benefit. 2 Littel. 162. It is in these words: "According to repeated decisions of this court under the word 'about,' the subsequent adventurer might be required to stop a little short of, or extend the search a little beyond the distance called for."

But, according to the principle of this rule, if he might stop eleven miles short, he may advance eleven miles beyond the distance called for; and two and twenty miles' search, or even the half of it, on the margin of such a stream, or any stream, would be too much to require of a subsequent locator.

Had the object called for had any claim to the attribute of notoriety, it might have had some greater claim to indulgence, on the principle of Taylor v. Kincaid, Hardin, Rep. 82, or, had there been proved a known and received computation of distance attributed to the object, it might have been considered with reference to the principle in Bowman v. Mellin, 3 Bibb, Rep. 153.

But there is no evidence of any received estimation of distance from the lick to the mouth of this creek; nor is there the least evidence that it took the name of "Foxe's" prior to the entry. On the contrary—and this furnishes another legal objection to this entry—there is evidence that at that time, and a year before,[1] 225*] it bore the name *of Indian Creek, and there is on the record a copy of an entry[2] made upon it by that name, in the same year, and only seven months junior to the entry of the appellants. Indeed, the time and incident that gave it the name it now bears, are positively proven to be cotemporaneous with the survey.

And, finally, if resort be had to the means of testing the identity of the call admitted in M'Kee v. Bodley, to wit, course and distance in a right line, we find the test entirely fatal to the call in this instance. The course is not given, and the distance is not one-third of that called for. And we farther find that there are at least two streams on the same river which answer the call, when subjected to this test, infinitely better; to wit, that now called the north fork, but which was formerly known as an undistinguished creek, and Warwick's creek or run, the former near thirty-five miles, and the latter twenty-seven and a half on a direct line from the lick.

On no principle, therefore, can this entry be supported, and the decree below must be affirmed with costs.

Decree accordingly.

TAYLOR'S DEVISEE v. OWING et al.

An entry, calling for the land to lie on the east side of Slate Creek, a south-west branch of the main fork of Licking, "beginning where a buffalo road crosseth said creek at the mouth of a branch emptying into said creek at the north-east side, it being the place of beginning for S. M.'s entry of 20,000 acres," is defective in certainty and precision; and its defects are not aided by the reference to S. M.'s entry for "20,000 acres, lying on the west side of Slate Creek, south-west branch of the main fork of Licking Creek, beginning where the buffalo road crosses Slate Creek, at the mouth of a branch, emptying in on the east side thereof; there are several cabins," etc., "to include a large quantity of fallen timber," etc.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Talbot for the appellant, and by Mr. Trimble for the respondents.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, praying a conveyance of a tract of land for which the defendants had obtained elder patents, and which the plaintiff claimed in virtue of a prior entry, which was made on the 6th of January, 1783, and is in these words: "James Taylor enters 12,000 acres of land on ten treasury warrants, No., etc.; to be laid off in one or more surveys, lying on the east side of Slate *Creek, of south-west branch [*227 of the main fork of Licking; beginning where a buffalo road crosseth said creek at the mouth of a branch emptying into said creek on the north-east side, it being the place of beginning for Samuel Meredith's entry of 20,000 acres; running from thence with said Meredith's line down Slate Creek, binding with the same the distance of three miles when reduced to a straight line from the beginning to his lower corner; thence continuing down the east side of Slate Creek, binding with the same as far as will amount to three miles when reduced to a straight line from Meredith's lower corner; thence extending from each end of this reduced line of six miles a north-east course, and continuing said course until a line at right angles to the same shall include the quantity of vacant land, exclusive of all legal prior claims."

The entry of Meredith was made on the 30th of November, 1822, and is in these words: "Samuel Meredith enters 20,000 acres, lying on the west side of Slate Creek, south-west branch of the main fork of Licking Creek; beginning where the buffalo road crosses Slate Creek, at the mouth of a branch emptying in on the east side thereof; there is several cabins on said ———, running from the beginning down Slate Creek, and binding thereon as far as will amount to three miles when reduced to a straight line; then from the beginning running up Slate Creek, and binding thereon as far as will amount to three miles when reduced to a straight line from the beginning, to include a large quantity of fallen *timber; and [*228 then to extend from the upper and lower end of these lines on the bank of Slate Creek, a west course, until a line running due south and north shall include the quantity of vacant land required to be laid off in one or more surveys."

The defendant contends that this entry is invalid, because it does not describe the land it seeks to appropriate with such certainty as to enable a subsequent purchaser to avoid it, and to locate the adjacent residuum.

The land is to lie on the east side of Slate Creek, a south-west branch of the main fork of Licking. Slate Creek was well known by this name, but it is a stream of considerable extent, and the law requires that the particular part of it on which Taylor's land is placed, should be designated so specially and precisely that a subsequent locator, using due diligence, and possessing ordinary intelligence, might appropriate the adjoining vacant lands. The plaintiff contends that this certainty is to be found in the description of Taylor's place of beginning. It is in these words: "Beginning where a buffalo road crosseth said creek, at the mouth of a branch emptying into said creek on the north-east side, it being the place of beginning for Samuel Meredith's entry of 20,000 acres."

It is the plain dictate of good sense, which is supported by the whole current of decisions in Kentucky, that an entry, to satisfy the law, must describe the place with sufficient accuracy to be found and known by others, and in terms [*229 which *will not fit other places equally well with that intended to be appropriated.

The particular descriptive words, or, in the technical language of the country, the locative calls of the entry, are a buffalo road crossing Slate Creek at the mouth of a branch emptying into the creek on the north-east side, and Meredith's beginning. The plaintiff contends that these words describe the mouth of Little Slate Creek.

Little Slate is a creek which empties into Slate on its north-east side, some say 30 or 40, others 50 or 60 miles, by the meanders of that stream above its mouth. The whole length of Slate is not mentioned by the witnesses, but it is sufficiently apparent that its source is a considerable distance above its mouth. Two creeks, Little Slate, and Mile Creek, Roe's run, and several branches, empty into it on the north-east side, and it is crossed by numerous buffalo traces, some of which are not far from the mouths of four streams, though no one is so near as that just below the mouth of Little Slate. The crossing place near that creek is stated to be ten or twelve yards below its mouth, by some of the witnesses, and by others to be rather more.

The objections made to this entry are not only that it is vague, but that it is calculated to mislead. It calls for a buffalo road crossing the creek at the mouth of a branch emptying into it on the east side. This trace is said to be so small as not to be generally denominated a road. The traces made by buffaloes are stated [*230 to be *of various dimensions, from three to ten or twelve feet wide, and sometimes wider. This near the mouth of Little Slate is about a foot wide, and is nearly lost in the bottom. It is represented by some of the witnesses rather as a deer path than a buffalo road. These traces have been called, by the inhabitants, roads, traces and paths. Some of the witnesses say that these names are used indiscriminately; others, that they designate larger or smaller routes; the word "road" being applied to a large trace, and "path" to a small one; that the trace at the mouth of Little Slate would never have been spoken of as a road.

Although the distinction between a road and a path is common throughout our country, yet the court must have supposed that it was not taken in Kentucky in reference to the traces of buffaloes, had the witnesses concurred in making this declaration. But they have not concurred in it. Many of them aver that the distinction is as applicable to tracts of this description as to others, and is in as common use. The court, therefore, cannot avoid supposing that a subsequent locater, finding this small path near the mouth of Little Slate, and understanding that there were considerable roads near the mouths of other streams, would think that this could not be the road required by Taylor's entry.

There is a still more important variance in the character of the stream itself. The entry calls for a branch, and Little Slate is a considerable creek. It could scarcely be mistaken for what *is denominated a branch; and a subse- [*231 quent locator, intending to lay his warrant at this place, could not reasonably suppose that it was already appropriated by an entry professing to begin at the mouth of a branch. In argument, the counsel for the plaintiff has sought to get over this difficulty by varying the language of his entry. He treats the question as if the entry had called for a branch of Slate Creek, and shows that Little Slate fits this call. The argument would have been strong had the language of the entry sustained it; but the words are, "the mouth of a branch emptying into Slate." The difference between "a branch of Slate," and "a branch emptying into Slate," is obvious.

There is still a farther difficulty which the plaintiff must encounter in this part of his case. It is alleged that Little Slate was the notorious name of the stream when Taylor's entry was made. It is well settled in Kentucky, that if objects called for in an entry are distinguished by a known name, it is a serious defect to call for them by a name which they possess in common with other similar objects, instead of their appropriate name. If, then, the fact be, that when Taylor's entry was made, Little Slate had its appropriate name, the locator ought to have used that name, and his substituting in its place the general call for "a branch emptying into Slate on the north-east side," constitutes a serious objection to the entry, which would require the aid of other words describing the place with greater certainty.

*The testimony on this point is not [*232 perfectly clear. Elias Folin says that, so early as 1775, he was one of a company that made improvements on that stream, and they called it Slate.

George Balla was also one of a company of improvers who encamped on Little Slate in 1776, and knew it then by that name. He knew it by the same name in 1783.

Isaac Clinkerhead knew Little Slate by that name in 1784, and thinks he heard it so called in 1782.

Ralph Morgan says that Little Slate was well known by that name in 1782.

William Williams has frequently heard hunters speak of Little Slate as a place of notoriety, previous to November, 1782, when Meredith's entry was made.

John Lix was with a company of hunters on Little Slate in 1776, when John Clarke gave the stream the name of Little Slate, and he has never known it by any other.

George Balla knew Slate, and Little Slate, by those names, in 1776.

Joseph M'Intire knew those streams by their present names in 1782.

These witnesses certainly prove that Little Slate was known by that name very extensively in 1782 and 1783, when the entries of Meredith and Taylor were made. It had, undoubtedly, acquired that name completely in 1786. A shade of doubt is cast on the general notoriety of this name, by the circumstances that several witnesses who speak of the stream as known to 233*] them at *this early period, and who distinguish it by its proper name, do not say that they then knew it by that name.

James M'Millan became acquainted with Little Slate in 1781, Joseph Young in the fall of 1783 or 1784, and Roger Clements in 1783. Neither of these witnesses say they knew it then by that name. They do not, indeed, say the contrary; but the probability is, that had they then known the stream by its present name, they would have been interrogated to the point. There is, then, much reason to believe that Little Slate had then acquired its appropriate name, and ought to have been so designated by the locator, though the proof is not conclusive.

Upon the whole, we think it very clear that Taylor's land is not described with sufficient certainty by the call, "to begin where a buffalo road crosses Slate at the mouth of a branch emptying into said creek on the north-east side." Is this defect remedied by the call for Meredith's beginning?

This reference to Meredith's entry makes a part of Taylor's, and will give the latter the advantage of any certainty of description which may be found in the former. Samuel Meredith calls to begin "where the buffalo road crosses Slate Creek at the mouth of a branch emptying in on the east side thereof; there is several cabins on said ———." The entry is to include a large quantity of fallen timber.

It will be perceived that the descriptive, or 234*] locative *calls of this entry, vary from those in Taylor's in these respects only. In describing the buffalo road, Meredith uses the article "the;" and he likewise adds to his description that there are several cabins, either on the creek or on the branch (for the word is not in the record), we suppose on the branch, and that his location will include a large quantity of fallen timber.

The objection made to Taylor's entry in consequence of the smallness of the trace crossing Slate near the mouth of Little Slate, applies with increased force to this part of Meredith's. The words, "the buffalo road," if they do not indicate a single road, would, unquestionably, lead a person in search of this entry to expect a remarkable and conspicuous road; such a road as crossed Slate near the mouth of Long branch, or Roe's run, not such a narrow path as crossed near the mouth of Little Slate.

The cabins alluded to in Meredith's entry were not found on Long branch. They were found on Roe's run and Mile Creek. The weight of testimony is, that no unusual quantity of fallen timber would be included in Meredith's survey if the beginning is at Little Slate, but would be included in it if the mouth of Roe's run be taken as the beginning. The two additional circumstances, then, the cabins and the fallen timber, are found, one of them on Little Slate and not on Long branch, which, but for that defect, would fit the description in the entry better than any other, and the other opposite Roe's run, and *not opposite [*235 Little Slate. The objection to Roe's run and Mile Creek is, that the buffalo road cannot be considered as crossing at the mouths of either of them.

Since, then, no place is shown which fits precisely the description of the entry, we must inquire whether that description is so nearly satisfied by appearances at the mouth of Little Slate as to induce the court to establish the title of the plaintiff.

The objections which have been stated to Taylor's entry are certainly not removed by calling in the aid of Meredith's. Passing by the increased strength they derive from the emphatic words, "the buffalo road," and from the absence of "a large quantity of fallen timber," we will inquire whether the appearance of cabins on Little Slate will cure the other defects of description in the entry. This circumstance was too common in that country to be itself an object of notoriety. Cabins were seen on Roe's run and Mile Creek, streams which empty into Slate on the north-east side, as well as on Little Slate. Their absence may exclude Long branch from the competition, but cannot decide in favor of Little Slate, unless other circumstances concur in its favor.

To the objections already mentioned, others may be added which appear to us to be insurmountable.

The entry is to begin on Slate Creek, where it is crossed by a buffalo road at the mouth of a branch emptying into the creek on the north-east *side. Twelve or fifteen buffalo [*236 roads cross the creek, and five or six, or more streams, empty into it on its north-east side. The creek is seventy or eighty miles in length. In what part of it is the subsequent locator to look for this road and this branch? It is not alleged that either of them possessed any notoriety which could conduct the person in search of them to any particular part of the creek. Can he be required to search from its mouth to its source? At which is he to commence? If at neither, but at the mean point between them, is he to look up or down the creek? If he should accidentally strike the creek at the mouth of Little Slate, he finds a creek instead of a branch, and a path instead of a road. The place does not suit the description in the entry. Some of the witnesses say that no other place suits it as well. Were this admitted to be true, how is he to know it until he examines the whole extent of the creek? This would be, undoubtedly, if we regard the decisions in Kentucky to impose an unreasonable burden on subsequent locators, one which the law could not intend to impose on them.

We think that the entry under which the plaintiff claims cannot be sustained, and that there was no error in dismissing his bill.

Decree affirmed with costs.

237*] [*Pleading. Practice.]

PERKINS v. HART, Executor of Hart.

When there is a special agreement open and subsisting at the time the cause of action arises, a general indebitatus assumpsit cannot be maintained.

But, if the agreement has been wholly performed, or if its further execution has been prevented by the act of the defendant, or by the consent of both parties; or if the contract has been fully performed in respect to any one distinct subject included in it, the plaintiff may recover upon a general indebitatus assumpsit.

A settled account is only prima facie evidence of its correctness, at law or in equity; it may be impeached by proof of fraud, or omission, or mistake; and if it be confined to particular items of account, concludes nothing as to other items not stated in it.

Where a case is certified to this court upon a division of opinions of the judges below, and the points reserved, upon which they were divided, are too imperfectly stated to enable this court to pronounce any opinion upon them, this court will neither award a venire de novo, nor certify any opinion to the court below upon the points reserved, but will merely certify that they are too imperfectly stated.

THIS was an action of general indebitatus assumpsit, brought to the Circuit Court of Ohio, for work and labor, care and diligence, by the plaintiff done and bestowed, as an agent and attorney, in exploring, showing, surveying and selling the lands of the defendant's testator; also, in searching of records, investigating titles, and in the payment of the taxes of the testator. The declaration contains the other general money counts. The plaintiff also filed what is styled an additional "bill of 238*] particulars" *for exploring, giving information of the situation and value, superintending law suit with Granger, attending to division with Mather's heirs, and for general superintendence of Hart's landed interest in Ohio (except for paying taxes), $3,500.

By consent of the parties the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff of $4,308.70 damages, if, upon the points reserved, the court should be of opinion that the law is for the plaintiff; but if, upon the points reserved, the court should be of opinion that the law is for the defendant, then they find for the defendant.

The opinions of the judges below being opposed, the cause was removed to this court upon a certificate of the disagreement, upon the three following points:

1. That the whole evidence, and Hart's (the testator's) letter of January 14, 1812; Perkins's (the plaintiff s) letter in reply, of February 10, 1812, and Hart's letter of March 9, 1812, in reply to Perkins, constitute a special agreement, investigating Perkins with the agency of Hart's land in the state of Ohio, open and subsisting at the time the cause of action is claimed to have arisen, which precludes Perkins from recovering in this action.

2. That the whole evidence, and the letters above cited, constitute a special agreement, defining the nature and extent of Perkins's agency, and settling the subjects upon which he was to receive compensation, and the amount of that compensation; the legal operation of which *agreement is to preclude Per- [*239 kins from claiming compensation for anything done in the execution of his agency, except according to the terms of that agreement.

3. That the plaintiff cannot recover for the two items in the bill of particulars claimed and charged to have arisen as matters of account between the parties in 1814 and 1815; because the plaintiff, on the 1st of February, 1815, and 19th of March, 1819, exhibited and stated his general account against William Hart, upon each of which a balance was due from, and paid by, the said William as a settlement upon an account stated, which precludes the plaintiff from recovering in this action for said two items claimed to have been due before the said accounts were rendered.

In the letter of Hart (the defendant's testator) of the 14th of January, 1812, he requested the plaintiff to give him his most favorable terms of agency, to appoint sub-agents to transact the business where he (the plaintiff) might deem necessary, with such compensation as he might agree upon with them. The letter then proceeded as follows: "State the amount of commissions you shall expect me to pay on account of sales that shall be collected and remitted, but no commissions to be paid by me till the collections are made. Provided sales are made by me in exchange for lands, and if I should draw on you for the amount to be paid

NOTE.—When an account stated may be impeached.

When an account is settled by the parties themselves, and there is no unfairness, and all the facts are equally well known to both sides, their adjustment is final and conclusive. Hager v. Thompson, 1 Black. 80.

The mere rendering an account does not make a stated one. Yet, if the other party receives the account, admits the correctness of the items, claims the balance, or offers to pay it, as it may be in his favor or against him, then it becomes a stated account. Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. 300, 335.

An account rendered, and not objected to within a reasonable time, is to be regarded as admitted, by the party charged, to be prima facie correct, and as a stated account. Wiggins v. Burkham, 10 Wall. 129.

It is not necessary that an account should be signed by the parties to make it a stated account. It is enough that it has been examined and accepted by the parties. This acceptance need not be expressed. It may be implied from circumstances. Keeping it implies acceptance; and if one does not object to an account which has been furnished him within a reasonable time, he is bound by it, unless he can show its incorrectness. Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. 1 Kern. 170; Bruen v. Hone, 2 Barb. 586; Harris v. Ely, Seld. notes, Dec. 1852; Allen v. Stevens, 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 359; Atwater v. Fowler, 1 Edw. 417; Phillips v. Belden, 2 Edw. 1; Dows v. Durfee, 10 Barb. 213; Murray v. Toland, 3 Johns. Ch. 569; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. s. 526; 2 Atk. 251; 2 Vern. 276; 2 Ves. 239; 6 Ala. 518; 4 Paige, 481; Davenport v. Wheeler, 7 Cow. 321.

Where a statement of account appears to have been deliberately made, and was understood to be a full and final settlement, it requires very strong and conclusive evidence of error or mistake to induce the court to open the account. The practice of opening accounts which the parties who could best understand them have themselves adjusted, should not be encouraged; and it should never be done upon a mere allegation of error supported by only probable testimony, especially when the parties to a settlement stood on an equality. Wilde v. Jenkins, 4 Paige, 481; Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. 1 Kern. 170; Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch, 306.

Where fraud is proved it will be sufficient ground to open the whole account; but where errors or mistakes only are shown to exist in the account, it will not be opened, but the party will merely be permitted to surcharge and falsify it. Surcharging applies to the balance of the whole account, and supposes credits omitted which ought to be allowed. Falsification applies to some item of the in lands at a price agreed upon, or otherwise, if necessary, to be left with you to be ascertained; 240*]in such case, *what should you expect to charge on sales of that nature? Please be particular in stating your terms of agency, and make them as favorable as possible." In the plaintiff's letter, in reply, of February 10th, 1812, he says: "My commission on sales made by me, the money collected and remitted, is eight per cent. When contracts are made (as is sometimes the case), purchasers make a payment, and then give up the land so as to be left, without encumbrance, to be sold again, 50 per cent. on such receipt. On these two items the commission cash, as it has been cash received. In case the agency should be closed and a settlement made, and contracts remain on hand unsettled, then, in all those contracts that should be carried into effect, five per cent. commission, received in contracts, with a conveyance of the lands covered by the contract or contracts received. On sales made in exchange for lands, etc., three per cent. commissions, to be received either in contracts here, or lands here at retail price. Always, as far as is practicable, receive commissions in that which shall be similar to that in which it is charged." The letter from the defendant's testator dated the 9th of March, 1812, in reply to the plaintiff acknowledges the receipt of the above letter, and then adds: "Your observations in regard to the note of selling new lands, are doubtless sanctioned by experience, and I am happy to commit the agency of my property to your experience and good judgment, from whence I expect to derive peculiar advantage."

241*] *The cause was argued in this court by Mr. Wright and Mr. Whittlesey for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Webster and Mr. Hammond for the defendant.

On the part of the plaintiff it was argued: (1) That where a special parol contract, or a written contract not under seal, has been entered into, the party may still recover on the common counts in a general indebitatus assumpsit.[1] In the case of The Bank of Columbia v. Patterson,[2] it was held to be inconvertibly settled, that indebitatus assumpsit will lie to recover the stipulated price due on a special contract, not under seal, where the contract has been completely executed; and that, in such case, it is not necessary to declare upon a special agreement. So, where a beneficial service has been rendered to the defendant, under the special agreement, but not in pursuance of its terms, the plaintiff may recover upon a quantum meruit.[3] Or where the defendant is the occasion of its non-performance; or where the contract has been rescinded by the parties, or put an end to by the defendant.[4] Or where the defendant, by his own act, defeats the performance.[5] And where the plaintiff *seeks to [*242 recover on a special contract, and the evidence offered will support a common count, supposing no special agreement, he may recover under the latter.[6]

2. The correspondence between the parties, and the other evidence in the cause, did not constitute an outstanding special agreement, such as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering in this form of action.[7]

3. The account stated did not specifically include the items stated in the bill of particulars. But a settled account, or a receipt, is only prima facie evidence, which the plaintiff may rebut by showing the true state of the accounts.[8]

On the part of the defendant, the counsel entered into a critical examination of the authorities cited on the other side to support the position that a general indebitatus assumpsit would lie in the present case; and although it was admitted that the precedents were to that effect, yet it was denied that they rested on any solid or consistent ground of principle; it was asserted that they had been settled without proper examination, and a due consideration of the general analogies of the law, and 243*] were calculated to *introduce uncertainty and confusion into legal proceedings, and to encourage negligence in making contracts, and infidelity in performing them. But, it was further insisted that those authorities, even supposing them to have irrevocably settled the practice, could not be applied to the present case. Here the contract specially defined the terms upon which it was to be performed by both parties, and also the terms upon which it was to be closed. In all the cases cited, the right of action was held to accrue upon the termination of the contract. While it subsisted, it could not be pretended that a general indebitatus assumpsit could be maintained. It had, indeed, been said that the contract was terminated by the death of the testator, and the act of his executor. But no case had gone so far as to decide that an agent, whose authority terminates upon the death of his principal, may proceed against his personal representatives upon the contract of agency, as if it had been terminated by some wrongful act of the principal. The authority of the agent terminates with the death of the principal, but for services performed under the agency, the contract remains open.

2. The agreement precluded the plaintiff from claiming compensation for anything done in execution of his agency, except according to the terms of that agreement. The case cited to show the contrary does not apply.[1] Here, whatever services the plaintiff performed before 244*] 1812, *in expectation of being compensated by the agency, must be considered as satisfied by the contract of agency then made. That contract must be regarded as embracing all services performed, or to be performed, by the plaintiff, for the defendant's testator, in respect to the sale of lands. If the disputed items of account arose under the contract, they could only be recovered in a special assumpsit grounded upon the contract. If they were claimed, independent of the contract, as not being within its terms, it was insisted that the plaintiff could set up no claim to compensation for services in the agency not embraced by the contract, which settled and defined the rights of the parties.

3. The question presented by the last point reserved was, whether the plaintiff, having presented two annual accounts of his agency, embracing items of debit and credit arising under his general agency, and arising also under his special agency in the sale of lands, having stated the balance due to him upon these accounts, and received payment, could recover in a general indebitatus assumpsit for other items of account due at the time the former were exhibited, without offering any evidence of error or omission. The plea of account stated, and payment of the balance found due, is a bar to the action of assumpsit.[2] If it be a bar, it must be an absolute bar at law, and not a mere presumption, which may be rebutted by contrary evidence. The account can only be opened, surcharged *or falsified, [*245 in equity. All the authorities referred to in the principal case cited from the New York reports,[3] are from the decisions in equity; but it does not follow that a court of law, not having the same means of doing justice between the parties, will pursue the same practice. At all events, in order to permit an account to be opened, there must be evidence of mistake or fraud.[4] There was neither in this case.

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The first point reserved in the court below, and on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, consists of two propositions: (1) That, upon the whole evidence, the three letters particularly referred to constitute a balance, the party receiving the check and obtaining the money on it was held bound, though he objected at the time that the balance was too small. Davenport v. Wheeler, 7 Cow. 231.

Courts are very unwilling to open an account when the parties have adjusted it, struck a balance, and agreed upon the amount due. But if there has been any mistake, omission, accident, fraud or undue advantage, by which an account stated is in truth vitiated and the balance incorrectly stated, equity will permit it to be opened and re-examined in toto, or as to particular items, as the allegations may warrant. Street, 2 Patt. & H. Va. 169; Dakin v. Demming, 6 Paige, 95; Dexter v. Arnold, 2 Sumn. 108; Atwood v. Fowler, 1 Edw. Ch. 417.

An account stated will not be opened without conclusive evidence of error or mistake, and the party seeking to open it on the ground of mistake assumes the burden of proving distinctly wherein the mistake consisted, and of furnishing the data by which it may be corrected. special agreement investing the plaintiff with the agency of Hart's lands in Ohio. (2) That this special agreement was open and subsisting at the time the cause of action is claimed to have arisen, which precludes the plaintiff from recovering in this action.

It is not easy to understand what the defendant's counsel mean by the whole evidence. Upon examining the voluminous record sent up to this court, we find that an active correspondence was carried on between Perkins and Hart from the year 1803 to 1816, upon the sub-246*] ject of Hart's *lands in Ohio, the payment of the accruing taxes on them, examining, surveying and preparing them for sale, and of other services to be performed by Perkins, in some way or other connected with those lands. If this be the evidence alluded to, there was no objection to submitting it to the court, to say whether the whole of this written evidence, or any part of it, created a special contract, investing Perkins with the agency of Hart's land.

But we find in this record evidence of a different character, such as accounts, receipts and depositions, in relation to Perkins's agency respecting Hart's lands in Ohio. If this was intended to constitute a part of the whole evidence upon which the question of law was to arise, we should be of opinion that it was fit only for the decision of the jury, and ought not to have been submitted to the court.

The disinclination which this court has always evinced, to send parties back to the court below, if, by any reasonable construction, obscure parts of the record can be explained, disposes us in the present instance to consider the verdict as referring to the written evidence, not only because it would have been improper to call upon the court to decide upon the effect of parol evidence, but because that which is spread upon this record has no apparent relevancy to the question of law which is submitted.

In the examination of the question whether there was a special agreement or not, we shall confine ourselves entirely to the three speci-247*] fied *letters because we are of opinion, after an attentive perusal of all the others, that they furnish not the slightest ground for saying that any agreement was entered into which invested Perkins with the agency of Hart's lands. The letters addressed by Hart to Perkins, treat him as an agent empowered to perform a variety of acts in relation to the lands of the former. But it was a limited agency, created for particular purposes, and as occasions required, but founded upon no special agreement which bound Perkins to perform any specified duties, or Hart to remunerate the services he might perform otherwise than the law bound him upon the principle of a quantum meruit. The particular agency which the former was requested, from time to time, to assume, was to pay taxes, attend to law suits, examine the lands so as to enable Hart to judge of their value, and to have certain lots and townships surveyed, as preparatory to a sale of them at a future period. The taxes were annually paid, and other advances made by Perkins, upon which he charged both a commission and interest, and these, it would seem, were punctually re-imbursed when drawn for, although the charge of interest was sometimes complained of.

The preparatory steps for bringing these lands, or certain portions of them, into the market having been taken, the correspondence commenced which is particularly referred to in the first and second reserved points.

In Hart's letter of the 14th of January, 1812, he requests Perkins to give him his most favorable *terms of agency, to appoint [*248 sub-agents to do business where he, Perkins, might judge necessary, with such compensation as he might agree upon with them. The letter then proceeds as follows: "State the amount of commissions you shall expect me to pay on amount of sales that shall be collected and remitted, but no commissions to be paid by me till the collections are made. Provided sales are made by me in exchange for lands, and if I should draw on you for the amount to be paid in lands at a price agreed on, or otherwise, if necessary, to be left with you to be ascertained, in such case what should you expect to charge on sales of that nature? Please be particular in stating your terms of agency, and make them as favorable as possible."

In answer to this letter, Perkins writes, on the 10th of February, 1812, as follows: "My commission on sales made by me, the money collected and remitted, is eight per cent. When contracts are made (as is sometimes the case), purchasers make a payment, and then give up the land so as to be left without encumbrance to be sold again, 50 per cent. on such receipt. On these two items the commission cash, as it has been cash received. In case the agency should be closed and a settlement made, and contracts remain on hand unsettled, then, in all those contracts that should be carried into effect, five per cent. commission, received in contracts, with a conveyance of the lands covered by the contract or contracts received. On sales made in exchange *for [*249 lands, etc., three per cent. commission, to be received either in contracts here, or lands here, at retail price. Always, as far as practicable, receive commissions in that which shall be similar to that in which it is charged."

The letter from Hart to Perkins, dated the 9th of March in the same year, acknowledges the receipt of the above letter, and then adds: "Your observations in regard to the mode of selling new lands, are doubtless sanctioned by experience, and I am happy to commit the agency of my property to your experience and good judgment, from whence I expect to derive peculiar advantage."

These letters, we think, constitute a special agreement upon the subject of commisisons to be paid by Hart to Perkins, by way of compensation for his agency in the sale of lands. It is confined to that subject only. The first of these letters invites Perkins to state his most favorable terms of agency in the sale of Hart's lands. The answer contains those terms by stating the commissions which he should expect to receive upon sales made, and the amount collected and remitted; upon sales made, and then abandoned by the purchaser after a partial payment of the purchase money; upon sales made, but the amount not collected before the agency should be closed; and finally, upon sales made by way of exchange for other property. The acceptance of these terms is sufficiently expressed in Hart's reply to this letter, by which he commits 250*] *to Perkins the agency of his property, the nature of which agency is too clearly explained by reference to the two preceding letters, to leave the slightest doubt as to the meaning and extent of the contract which was thus entered into.

The second proposition is, "that this special agreement was open and subsisting at the time the cause of action is supposed to have arisen." Now, this proposition involves a mixed question of law and fact. If the contract was open, and the action was founded on that contract, then the legal consequence insisted upon, "that Perkins cannot recover in this action," undeniably follows. But whether, in point of fact, it was open when the cause of action is claimed to have arisen, that is, the life-time of W. Hart, must depend upon the evidence in the cause, of which the jury were alone competent to judge. If the agreement was wholly performed by the plaintiff during the life-time of Hart; if its farther execution was put an end to, before its completion, by the act of Hart, or by the agreement of both parties, then the plaintiff was not precluded from recovering in this action. Nay, further, if the contract was fully performed in relation to any one subject covered by it; as, for example, by the sale, collection and remittance of the purchase money for any one township or parcel of land, the plaintiff might well maintain an action of indebitatus assumpsit for his stipulated compensation, in cash, on that transaction, and was not bound to wait until all the lands to which his agency extended were dis- 251*] posed of. Where the *agreement embraces a number of distinct subjects which admit of being separately executed and closed, it must be taken distributively, each subject being considered as forming the matter of a separate agreement after it is so closed. If, for instance, the agreement between a merchant and his factor be, that the latter shall sell and remit the proceeds of all cargoes which the former shall consign to him upon a stipulated commission, it can hardly be contended that the factor cannot recover his commissions in this form of action, upon the proceeds of a single cargo which have been remitted, while there remain other cargoes yet undisposed of.

But, whether this agreement was wholly closed, or whether any one or more of its parts were closed, in either of the ways above mentioned, or in any other way, was a fact resting altogether upon the evidence, whether written or parol, which was, or might be, laid before the jury. It belonged exclusively to that body to say whether the fact existed or not; and, upon the fact so found, the question of law would fairly arise. In this respect, therefore, we are of opinion that the verdict is clearly defective, and ought to have been set aside by the court below.

It may not be amiss to add that if the question reserved were, whether the agreement was open and subsisting at the time this action was brought, we should be of opinion that the agency of Perkins having terminated by the death of Mr. Hart, the further execution of the agreement was put an end to by that event, and that, consequently, *it was [*252 not open when the action was brought. But the proposition is so stated as to refer to a period antecedent to the death of Hart.

The second point reserved is thus expressed: "That, upon the whole evidence, Hart's letter of January 14th, 1812," and so referring to the other two letters as in the first point, "constitute a special agreement, defining the nature and extent of Perkins's agency, and settling the subjects upon which he was to receive compensation, and the amount of that compensation, the legal operation of which agreement is to preclude Perkins from claiming compensation for anything done in the execution of his agency, except according to the terms of that agreement."

It has been already stated that the three letters particularly referred to in this point, did constitute a special agreement upon the subject of commissions to be paid to Perkins by way of compensation for his agency in the sale of Hart's lands. And, it may be added that this agreement settles the subjects upon which Perkins was to receive compensation, and the amount of that compensation. If so, there can be no question but that the legal operation of this agreement, as to every claim founded upon it, is to preclude Perkins from recovering any compensation which is not consistent with the terms of that agreement. For, although in the cases before stated, in which the special agreement has been executed, or otherwise closed, a general indebitatus assumpsit may be maintained, it is nevertheless true that the special agreement may *be [*253 given in evidence by the defendant for the purpose of lessening the quantum of damages to which the plaintiff is entitled.

But, after all this is admitted, the inference of law insisted upon by the defendant, that Perkins is precluded by the special agreement from claiming compensation for anything done in the execution of his agency, except according to the terms of that agreement, does not follow. The agreement is clearly prospective, and is confined to the single subject of commissions on the sale of lands. This is apparent from Hart's letter of the 14th of January, 1812, which he prefaces by stating that he had concluded to offer certain portions of his lands for sale at that time, and his other lands when they should be partitioned. He desires Perkins, as his agent, to make the necessary previous arrangements, and to proceed in the sale of the portions before mentioned, and of No. 2, in the 13th range, as soon as the partition should be completed, and then he proceeds to inquire his terms of agency as before mentioned. But, when we look into the whole evidence, to which we are referred by the point reserved, it is found that the agency of Perkins commenced as early as the year 1803, and extended to a variety of duties unconnected with that of selling land; such as exploring the lands of his principal, having them surveyed, their quality and value ascertained, investigating titles, attending to law suits, paying taxes, and making other advances.

Now, it is impossible to contend, with any *probability of success, that Perkins [*254 was precluded by the special agreement from recovering, under the general counts, a compensation for those services, or, indeed, for any other services rendered by him in his character of agent, which are not strictly within the scope of the special agreement. But the point raised here is, that he is precluded from claiming compensation for anything done in the execution of his agency, except according to the terms of that agreement, although the services so rendered are not embraced by it.

What was the nature of the particular claim submitted to the jury, upon which the parties consented that a verdict should be given for the plaintiff, the record does not enable this court distinctly to decide. So far as any information is to be derived from the declaration, and the additional bill of particulars, it would rather seem as if it was for general services rendered by the plaintiff without the scope of the special agreement, that being confined, as before observed, to commissions on land sales.

If the paper found in this record, headed thus, "Perkins's account, on which the action is brought," which contains three items for commissions on as many sales of land, and three others for interest on those commissions, is to be considered as the original bill of particulars filed in the cause, it would seem to follow that the action was brought to recover, as well those commissions as a compensation for general services not embraced by the special agree- [*255 ment. *Upon this state of the case, the conclusion of law insisted upon in this point would, nevertheless, be incorrect, for the reasons already stated.

It was contended by the council for the defendant that this action would not lie in a case where, by the agreement, the plaintiff was to be compensated in land. This is not controverted. But it will be sufficient to observe that it is not stated in the points reserved, or in the account just referred to (if it be admitted to be the original bill of particulars), that the commissions there charged arose upon an exchange of lands, or were to be discharged by land. The case is too imperfectly stated to enable this court to say that it gives rise to the question to which the argument is directed.

The third and last point reserved is thus expressed: "That the plaintiff cannot recover for the two items in the bill of particulars claimed and charged to have arisen as matters of account between the parties in 1814 and 1815, because the plaintiff, on the 1st of February, 1815, and on the 19th of March, 1816, exhibited and stated his general account against William Hart, upon each of which a balance was due from, and paid by, the said William, as a settlement upon an account stated, which precludes the plaintiff from recovering in this action, for said two items claimed to have been due before the said accounts were rendered.

The difficulty of this point consists in the imperfect manner in which it is stated. The court may conjecture that the bill of particu- [*256 lars alluded *to is the paper just referred to; but whether it be so or not is by no means certain. If it be the bill intended, the difficulty still remains, as the general account is not stated, or referred to, so as to enable the court to decide whether it does, or does not, include the two items which it is supposed cannot be recovered in this action.

If we look through this record in order to obtain information respecting this matter, we meet with two accounts containing charges for advances made by Perkins, in the years 1814 and 1815, for taxes due by Hart, and in discharge of other expenses connected with his agency, both which accounts were discharged. But it surely cannot be contended that the settlement and discharge of an account for money lent and advanced for the use of the testator, is a bar to a claim for commissions, or of any other demand not included in the settled account. If, to a bill for an account, the defendant plead, or, in his answer rely, upon a settled account, the plaintiff may surcharge, by alleging and proving omissions in the account, or may falsify, by showing errors in some of the items stated in it.

The rule is the same in principle at law; a settled account is only prima facie evidence of its correctness. It may be impeached by proof of unfairness, or mistake, in law, or in fact; and if it be confined to particular items of account, it concludes nothing in relation to other items not stated in it.

*The legal conclusion, therefore, in- [*257 sisted upon by the defendant, that the plaintiff is precluded from recovering in this action for the two items claimed to have been due before the two accounts spoken of were rendered, is not correctly drawn, unless it appeared, from the point reserved, that those two items were included in what is styled the account stated.

It may further be remarked, that even if it appeared that the plaintiff was precluded by the settlement and discharged from recovering the amount of the two items referred to, it would not follow that the law is for the defendant upon the whole verdict, although it might be sufficient to induce the court below to grant a new trial, if it had been applied for, upon the ground that the verdict was for too much.

Were this cause before the court upon a writ of error, the imperfections in the points reserved which have been noticed, would render it proper to reverse the judgment, and to direct a venire de novo to be awarded. Being an adjourned case, it would be improper for this court to give any such direction to the court below.

Certificate.—This cause came on to be argued on the certificate of division in opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court for the district of Ohio. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the points reserved, upon which the opinions of the judges of that court were opposed, are too imperfectly stated to enable this court to pronounce any opinion upon them.

[*Illegal Contract.] [*258

v.

TOLER, Defendant in Error.

Where a contract grows immediately out of, and is connected with, an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it.

So, if the contract be in part only connected with the illegal consideration, and growing immediately out of it, though it be, in fact, a new contract, it is equally tainted by it.

But if the promise be entirely disconnected with the illegal act, and is founded on a new consideration, it is not effected by the act, although it was known to the party to whom the promise was made, and although he was the contriver and conductor of the illegal act.

Thus, where A, during a war, contrived a plan for importing goods on his own account from the enemy's country, and goods were sent to B by the same vessel; A, at the request of B, became surety for the payment of the duties on B's goods, and became responsible for the expenses on a prosecution for the illegal importation of the goods, and was compelled to pay them. Held, that A might maintain an action on the promise of B to refund the money.

But if the importation is the result of a scheme between the plaintiff and defendant, or if the plaintiff has any interest in the goods, or if they are consigned to him with his privity, in order that he may protect them for the owner, a promise to repay any advances made under such understanding or agreement is utterly void.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the defendant in error, Toler, against the plaintiff in error, Armstrong, to recover a sum of 259*] *money paid by Toler, on account of goods, the property of Armstrong and others, consigned to Toler, which had been seized and libeled in the District Court of Maine in the year 1814, as having been imported contrary to law. The goods were shipped during the late war with Great Britain, at St. Johns, in the province of New Brunswick, for Armstrong and other citizens and residents of the United States, and consigned to Toler, also a domiciled citizen of the United States. The goods were delivered to the agent of the claimants on stipulation to abide the event of the suit, Toler becoming liable for the appraised value; and Armstrong's part of the goods were afterwards delivered to him, on his promise to pay Toler his proportion of any sum for which Toler might be liable, should the goods be condemned. The goods having been condemned, Toler paid their appraised value, and brought this action to recover back from Armstrong his proportion of the amount. At the trial of the cause, the defendant below resisted the demand, on the principle that the contract was void, as having been made on an illegal consideration. When the testimony on the part of the plaintiff below was concluded, the counsel for the defendant insisted, on his behalf, to the court, that the several matters propounded and given in evidence on the part of the plaintiff were not sufficient, and ought not to be allowed, as decisive evidence to entitle the plaintiff to maintain the issue, and to recover against the defendant. The judge thereupon *delivered the following charge to the [*260 jury, which is spread at large upon the record.

"The rule of law under which the defendant seeks to shelter himself against a compliance with his contract, to idemnify the plaintiff for all sums which he might have to pay on account of the goods shipped from New Brunswick for the defendant, and consigned to the plaintiff, is a salutary one, founded in morality and good policy, and which recommends itself to the good sense of every man as soon as it is stated. The principle of the rule is, that no man ought to be heard in a court of justice, who seeks to enforce a contract founded in or arising out of moral or political turpitude. The rule itself has sometimes been carried to inconvenient lengths; the difficulty being, not in any unsoundness in the rule itself, but in its fitness to the particular cases to which it has been applied. Does the taint in the original transaction infect and vitiate every contract growing out of it, however remotely connected with it? This would be to extend the rule beyond the policy which produced it, and would lead to the most inconvenient consequences; carried out to such an extent, it would deserve to be entitled a rule to encourage and protect fraud. So far as the rule operates to discourage the perpetration of an immoral or illegal act, it is founded in the strongest reason, but it cannot safely be pushed farther. If, for example, the man who imports goods for another, by means of a violation of the laws of his country, is dis-261*] qualified from *founding any action upon such illegal transaction, for the value or freight of the goods, or other advances made on them, he is justly punished for the immorality of the act, and a powerful discouragement from the perpetration of it is provided by the rule. But after the act is accomplished, no new contract ought to be affected by it; it ought not to vitiate the contract of the retail merchant, who buys these goods from the importer, that of the tailor, who purchases from the merchant, or of the customers of the former, amongst whom the goods are distributed in clothing, although the illegality of the original act was known to each of the above persons, at the time he contracted.

"I understand the rule, as now clearly settled, to be, that where the contract grows immediately out of, and is connected with, an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it. And if the contract be in part only connected with the illegal transaction, and growing immediately out of it, though it be, in fact, a new contract, it is equally tainted by it. The case before supposed, of an action for the value of goods illegally imported for another, or freight and expenses attending, founded upon a promise express or implied, exemplifies a part of the above rule; the latter part of it may be explained by the following case: As if the importation was the result of a scheme to consign the goods to the friend of the owner, with the privity of the former, that he might protect and defend them for the owner in case they should be brought into 262*] *jeopardy, I should consider a bond or promise afterwards given by the owner to his friend, to indemnify him for his advances on account of any proceedings against the property or otherwise, to constitute a part of the res gestæ, or of the original transaction, though it purports to be a new contract. For it would clearly be a promise growing immediately out of, and connected with, the illegal transaction. It would be, in fact, all one transaction; and the party to whom the promise was made would, by such a contrivance, contribute, in effect, to the success of the illegal measure.

"But, if the promise be unconnected with the illegal act, and is founded on a new consideration, it is not tainted by the act, although it was known to the party to whom the promise was made, and although he was the contriver and conductor of the illegal act. Thus, if A should, during war, contrive a plan for importing goods from the country of the enemy, on his own account, by means of smuggling, or of a collusive capture, and in the same vessel should be sent goods for B; and A should, upon the request of B, become surety for payment of the duties, or should undertake to become answerable for expenses on account of a prosecution for the illegal importation, or should advance money to B to enable him to pay those expenses; these acts constituting no part of the original scheme, here would be a new contract upon a valid and legal consideration, unconnected with the original act, although remotely caused by it; and such con-263*] tract *would not be so contaminated by the turpitude of the offensive act, as to turn A out of court when seeking to enforce it, although the illegal introduction of the goods into the country was the consequence of the scheme projected by A in relation to his own goods.

"Whether the plaintiff has any interest in the goods imported by the defendant from New Brunswick, or was the contriver of, or concerned in, a scheme to introduce these goods, or even his own, if he had any, into the United States, by means of a collusive capture or otherwise, or consented to become the consignee of the defendant's goods, with a view to their introduction, are questions which must depend upon the evidence, of which you must judge. It ought, however, to be remembered that it would seem, from the letters of introduction of the defendant to the plaintiff, some time after this importation had taken place, that these gentlemen were, at that time, strangers to each other."

And the jurors having submitted to the court an inquiry, in the words following, viz.: "The jury beg leave to ask the judge, whether Toler must have an interest in Armstrong's goods to constitute him a participator in the voyage. If simply having goods on board will constitute him such." The court gave their opinion upon the same as follows: "The plaintiff simply having goods on board would not constitute him a participator, or affect the contract with the defendant. Being interested in the goods would."

This charge was excepted to by the defendant, *and a verdict having been found [*264 for the plaintiff, on which a judgment was rendered in his favor, the cause was brought, by writ of error, to this court.

Mr. Webster and Mr. Wheaton, for the plaintiff in error, stated, that this case arose out of an illegal importation of goods from the enemy's country during the late war, upon the false and fraudulent pretext of a capture jure belli, which was finally pronounced by this court to be collusive, and the property condemned to the government.[1] They argued, that although the abstract principles laid down in the charge of the court below might be considered as correct in point of law, no one of the hypothetical cases put by the learned judge fully stated the facts as proved in the cause. The whole case being submitted, and the court being asked to give a general instruction, the charge ought to have been applicable to the case in evidence, which, it was contended, it was not. Admitting, therefore, the opinions in the charge to be correct, it was still liable to exception, because there was a material part of the case which it did not embrace. The charge did not state what the law would be, if Toler knew, previous to the consignment, that Armstrong was engaged in this unlawful trade. The general principle, that no action could be maintained upon a contract growing out of an immoral or illegal transaction, was insisted on *as applicable to this case, where the [*265 transaction was not subsequent or collateral, but directly connected with the unlawful act.[2]

The authorities cited would show that this principle has been constantly recognized in the courts of justice both in England and this country, and it might, indeed, be said to form a rule of universal law which had been incorporated into the civil code of every nation.[1]

266*] *Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, contra, insisted that the law on this subject was accurately laid down in the judge's charge, and although there was some apparent discrepancy in the cases, they would all be found to be reconciled by the clear and intelligible principles of the charge. The distinction was, that where the contract was disconnected with the original unlawful act, and was founded on a new and distinct consideration, an action might be maintained upon it, although it could not be maintained upon a contract directly arising out of the illegal act.[2] The questions of fact,

267*] *whether Toler had any interest in Armstrong's goods, or was the contriver of, or concerned in, a scheme to introduce them into this country by any unlawful means, or consented to become the consignee of the goods with a view to their introduction, were fairly left to the jury, and are found by them in favor of the plaintiff. So that the whole question arose upon the abstract correctness of the charge, and the propositions of law laid down to the jury. Unless these could be shown to be erroneous, the judgment must be affirmed. It was also urged that if the taint of the original illegality of transactions was suffered to infect new contracts with third parties, upon different considerations, it would put a most inconvenient restraint upon trade, and the whole business of life.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The only point moved by the defendant's counsel to the court was, that the evidence was not decisive in favor of the plaintiff. The court gave this opinion. The charge does not intimate that the testimony was conclusive, but leaves the case to the jury, to be decided by them under the control of certain legal principles which are stated in the charge. To entitle the plaintiff in error to a judgment of reversal, he must show that some one of these principles is erroneous to his prejudice.

The main object of the charge is to state to *the jury the law of contracts on an il- [*268 legal consideration, so far as it was supposed to bear on the case before them. To enable them to apply the law to the facts, the court supposed many cases in which the contract would be void, the consideration being illegal. It is unnecessary to review this part of the charge, because it is entirely favorable to the plaintiff in error.

After having stated the law to be, that where the contract grows immediately out of an illegal act, a court of justice will not enforce it, the court proceeds to say: "But if the promise be unconnected with the illegal act, and is founded on a new consideration, it is not tainted by the act, although it was known to the party to whom the promise was made, and although he was the contriver and conductor of the illegal act. Thus, if A should, during war, contrive a plan for importing goods from the country of the enemy, on his own account, by means of smuggling, or of a collusive capture, and goods should be sent in the same vessel for B; and A should, upon the request of B, become surety for the payment of the duties, or should undertake to become answerable for the expenses on account of a prosecution for illegal importation, or should advance money to B to enable him to pay those expenses, these acts constituting no part of the original scheme, here would be a new contract upon a valid and legal consideration, unconnected with the original act, although remotely caused by it, and such contract would not be so contaminated by the turpitude of the offensive act as *to turn A out of court [*269 when seeking to enforce it, although the illegal introduction of the goods into the country was the consequence of the scheme projected by A in relation to his own goods."

If this opinion be contrary to law, the judgment ought to be reversed. The opinion is, that a new contract, founded on a new consideration, although in relation to property respecting which there had been unlawful transactions between the parties, is not itself unlawful. This general proposition is illustrated by particular examples, and will be best understood by considering the examples themselves. The case supposed is, that A, during a war, contrives a plan for importing goods on his own account from the country of the enemy, and that goods are sent to B, by the same vessel. A, at the request of B, becomes surety for the payment of the duties which accrue on the goods of B, and is compelled to pay them; can he maintain an action on the promise of B to return this money? The opinion is, that such an action may be sustained. The case does not suppose A to be concerned, or in any manner instrumental in promoting the illegal importation of B, but to have been merely engaged himself in a similar illegal transaction, and to have devised the plan for himself, which B afterwards adopted. This illustration explains what was meant by the general words previously used, which, unexplained, would have been exceptionable.

The contract made with the government for 270*] *the payment of duties is a substantive independent contract, entirely distinct from the unlawful importation. The consideration is not infected with the vice of the importation. If the amount of duties be paid by A for B, it is the payment of a debt due in good faith from B to the government; and if it may not constitute the consideration of a promise to repay it, the reason must be, that two persons who are separately engaged in an unlawful trade can make no contract with each other; at any rate, no contract, which, in any manner, respects the goods unlawfully imported by either of them. This would be to connect distinct and independent transactions with each other, and to infuse into one, which was perfectly fair and legal in itself, the contaminating matter which infected the other. This would introduce extensive mischief into the ordinary affairs and transactions of life, not compensated by any one accompanying advantage.

The same principle, diversified in form, is illustrated by another example. If A should become answerable for expenses on account of a prosecution for the illegal importation, or should advance money to B to enable him to pay those expenses, these acts, the court thought, would constitute a new contract, the consideration of which would be sufficient to maintain an action.

It cannot be questioned that, however strongly the laws may denounce the crime of importing goods from the enemy in time of war, the act of defending a prosecution instituted in 271*] consequence *of such illegal importation is perfectly lawful. Money advanced, then, by a friend in such a case, is advanced for a lawful purpose, and a promise to repay it is made on a lawful consideration. The criminal importation constitutes no part of this consideration.

It is laid down with great clearness, that if the importation was the result of a scheme between the plaintiff and defendant, or if the plaintiff had any interest in the goods, or if they were consigned to him with his privity, that he might protect and defend them for the owner, a bond or promise given to repay any advances made in pursuance of such understanding or agreement would be utterly void.

The questions whether the plaintiff had any interest in the goods of the defendant, or was the contriver of, or concerned in, a scheme to introduce them, or consented to become the consignee of the defendant's goods, with a view to their introduction, were left to the jury. The point of law decided is, that a subsequent independent contract, founded on a new consideration, is not contaminated by the illegal importation, although such illegal importation was known to Toler, when the contract was made, provided he was not interested in the goods, and had no previous concern in their importation.

Questions upon illegal contracts have arisen very often, both in England and in this country; and no principle is better settled than that no action can be maintained on a contract, the consideration of which is either wicked in itself, or *prohibited by law. How far this princi-[*272 ple is to affect subsequent or collateral contracts, the direct and immediate consideration of which is not immoral or illegal; is a question of considerable intricacy, on which many controversies have arisen, and many decisions have been made. In Faikney v. Reynous, 4 Burr. 2069, the plaintiff and one Richardson were jointly concerned in certain contracts prohibited by law, on which a loss was sustained, the whole of which was paid by the plaintiffs; and a bond was given for securing the repayment of Richardson's proportion of the loss. To a suit on this bond, the defendants pleaded the statute prohibiting the original transaction, but the court held, on demurrer, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Although this was the case of a bond, the judgment does not appear to have turned on that circumstance. Lord Mansfield gave his opinion on the general ground that if one person apply to another to pay his debt (whether contracted on the score of usury, or for any other purpose), he is entitled to recover it back again. This is a strong case to show that a subsequent contract, not stipulating a prohibited act, although for money advanced in satisfaction of an unlawful transaction, may be sustained in a court of justice. In a subsequent case, 6 Term Rep. 10, Ashhurst, J., said the defendants were held liable because they had voluntarily given another security.

In the case of Petrie and another, Executors of Keeble, v. Hannay, 3 Term Rep. 418, the *testator of the plaintiffs was engaged [*273 with the defendant and others in stock transactions, which were forbidden by law, on which considerable losses had been sustained, which were paid by Portis, their broker. Keeble repaid the broker the whole sum advanced by him except £84, which was, in part, the defendant's share of the loss, for which Keeble drew a bill on the defendant, which was accepted. The bill not being paid, a suit was brought upon it by Portis against the executors of Keeble, and judgment obtained, they not setting up the illegal consideration. The executors brought this action to recover the money they had paid, and it was held, by three judges against one, on the authority of Faikney v. Reynous, that the plaintiffs could maintain their action. A distinction was taken in cases where money was paid by one person for another, on an illegal transaction, by which the parties were not bound; between a voluntary payment and one made on the request of the party; between an assumpsit raised by operation of law, and an express assumpsit. Although the former would not support the action, it was held that the latter would.

This, also, is a strong case to show that a new contract, by which money is advanced at the request of another, or, which is the same thing, where there is an express promise to pay, may sustain an action, although the money was advanced to satisfy an illegal claim.

In Farmer v. Russell et al. 1 Bos. & Pull. 274*] *295, it was held that if A is indebted to B on a contract forbidden by law, and pays the money to C for the use of B, a court will give judgment in favor of B against C for this money. In this case, B could not have recovered against A, but when the money came into the hands of C, a new promise was raised on a new consideration, which was not infected by the vice of the original contract. In this case, Chief Justice Eyre said that the plaintiff's demand arose simply from this circumstance that money was put into the hands of C for his use; and Justice Buller said that the action did not arise upon the ground of the illegal contract. Yet, in this case, A's original title to the money was founded on an unlawful contract, and he could not have maintained an action against B.

The general proposition stated by Lord Mansfield in Faikney v. Reynous, that if one person pay the debt of another at his request, an action may be sustained to recover the money, although the original contract was unlawful, goes far in deciding the question now before the court. That the person who paid the money knew it was paid in discharge of a debt not recoverable at law, has never been held to alter the case. A subsequent express promise is, undoubtedly, equivalent to a previous request.

In most of the cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, the suit has been brought by a party to the original transaction, or on a contract so connected with it as to be inseparable from it. As, where a vendor in a foreign 275*] *country packs up goods for the purpose of enabling the vendee to smuggle them; or where a suit is brought on a policy of insurance on an illegal voyage; or on a contract which amounts to maintenance; or on one for the sale of a lottery ticket, where such sale is prohibited; or on a bill which is payable in notes issued contrary to law. In these, and in all similar cases, the consideration of the very contract on which the suit is brought is vicious, and the plaintiff has contributed to the illegal transaction. One of the strongest cases in the books is Steers v. Laishley, 6 Term Rep. 61, where the broker, who had been concerned in stock jobbing transactions, and had paid the losses, drew a bill of exchange for the amount on the defendant, and, after its acceptance, indorsed it to a person who knew of the illegal transaction on which it was drawn, the court held that such indorsee could not recover on the bill.

In this case, the broker himself could not recover, being a party in the original offense against the law, and his bill being drawn for the very money which was due on the original transaction, and indorsed to a person having notice, left the indorsee in the same situation with the drawer. Yet, Lord Kenyon said, in this case, that if the plaintiff had lent the money to the defendant to pay the differences, and had afterwards received the bill for the money so lent, he might have recovered on it. The difference between the case decided, and that put by the judge, is not very discernible, as the one or the other may affect *morals, [*276 or the policy of the law. The distinction would seem to be founded on this legal ground, that the money lent would constitute a new consideration, and be the foundation of a new contract, which could not be vitiated by a knowledge of the purpose for which the money was lent, and the bill drawn. So Toler's knowledge of the illegal transactions of Armstrong, and that his money was advanced to procure the delivery of goods which had been illegally imported, could not vitiate a contract to repay that money.

In the case of Booth v. Hodgson, 6 Term Rep. 405, the suit was between the original parties to the illegal transaction, and was bottomed on it.

Supposing the opinions actually contained in the charge to be correct, it is still contended to be liable to exception, because there is a material part of the very case which it does not embrace. The charge, it is said, does not state what the law would be, if Toler knew, previous to the consignment, that Armstrong was engaged in this illicit commerce.

Without entering into the inquiry whether this criticism on the charge be well or ill founded, the court think it proper to declare, in explicit terms, that the plaintiff in error cannot avail himself of it in this stage of the cause.

To bring all the testimony offered at the trial of a cause at common law, instead of facts, into this court, by a bill of exceptions, or otherwise, is a practice which, to say the least, is extremely *inconvenient. Its tendency is to [*277 convert this court from a tribunal for the decision of points of law, into one for the investigation of facts, and for weighing evidence. To look into that testimony for the purpose of inquiring whether the judge has omitted anything material in his charge, would be to yield to this practice, and to sanction it in its most exceptionable form. If the defendant's counsel wished the instruction of the judge to the jury on any point which was omitted in the charge, his course was to suggest the point, and request an opinion on it. If counsel may, without pursuing this course, spread the whole testimony on the record, and then, by a general exception to the charge, enable himself to take advantage, not only of a misdirection, but of any omission to notice any question which may be supposed, by this court, to have arisen in the case, such a course would obviously transfer to the Supreme Court the appropriate duties of a circuit court, and cannot be countenanced.

It is also contended by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that the judge has erred in not answering fully the inquiry made by the jury. That was in these words: "The jury beg leave to ask the judges whether Toler must have an interest in Armstrong's goods to constitute him a participator in the voyage. If simply having goods on board will constitute him such." The court answered as follows: "The plaintiff, simply having goods on board, would not constitute him a participator, or affect the contract *with the defendant. [*278 Being interested in the goods would."

There is much reason to believe that the first of these questions was not understood by the jury, or by the judge, according to the literal import of the words. The inquiry would seem to be, whether, under any possible view of the transaction, Toler could be tainted with the guilt of Armstrong so as to affect the contract in suit, unless he had an interest in the goods. This was probably not the intention of the jury, because an answer to this question is to be found in the charge. The judge had stated that if Toler was the contriver of, or concerned in, a scheme to introduce these goods into the United States, or had consented to become the consignee with a view to their introduction, these circumstances would vitiate the contract. He had already said, therefore, that an interest in Armstrong's goods was not indispensably necessary to make Toler a participator in the voyage, as to all the purposes of the defense. He had stated two cases specially, either of which the jury might consider as proved by the evidence, in which the consideration would be unlawful; and he had said generally, "that where the contract grows immediately out of, and is connected with, an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it. And if the contract be, in fact, only connected with the illegal transaction, and growing immediately out of it, though it be in fact a new contract, it is equally tainted by it." There is much reason to believe that 279*] *the jury could not have intended to put a question which had been already answered, and that they might design to ask, whether, having goods on board belonging to himself, would place him in the same situation as if interested with Armstrong. The answer of the court would show that the questions were understood in this sense, and that answer appears to have been satisfactory to the jury.

However this may be, we think the law was correctly stated by the court; and we cannot admit that a judgment is to be reversed because an answer does not go to the full extent of the question. Had the jury desired further information, they might, and probably would, have signified their desire to the court. The utmost willingness was manifested to gratify them, and it may fairly be presumed that they had nothing farther to ask.

We think that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and that it ought to be affirmed, with costs and damages, at the rate of six per centum per annum.

[*Ejectment. Evidence. Practice.]

CHIRAC et al. v. REINICKER.

A counsel or attorney is not a competent witness to testify as to facts communicated to either by his client, in the course of the relation subsisting between them, but may be examined as to the mere fact of the existence of that relation.

The action for mesne profits may be maintained against him who was the landlord in fact, who received the rents and profits, and resisted the recovery in the ejectment suit, although he was not a party to that suit, and did not take upon himself the defense thereof upon the record, but another did as landlord.

A recovery in ejectment is conclusive evidence in an action for mesne profits against the tenant in possession, but not in relation to third persons. But where the action is brought against the landlord in fact, the record, in the ejectment suit, is admissible to show the possession of the plaintiff connected with his title, although it is not conclusive upon the defendant in the same manner as if he had been a party on the record.

Amendments to the pleadings are matters in the discretion of the court below. Error will not lie to this court, on the allowance or refusal of such amendments.

Variances between the writ and declaration cannot be taken advantage of in the court below, after plea pleaded.

Quære, Whether by the modern practice such variances can be taken advantage of at all.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This was an action of trespass for mesne profits, brought by the plaintiffs in error, Chirac and others, against the defendant in error, Reinicker, in the court below. The plaintiffs had recovered judgment, and possession of the premises, in an injectment, in which one C. J. F. Chirac prayed *leave of the court, [*281 as landlord of the premises, to be made defendant in the place of the casual ejector, and was admitted accordingly under the common consent rule. At the trial of the present suit the record of the proceedings in the ejectment were offered by the plaintiffs as evidence to maintain this action; and they then offered to prove, by the testimony of R. G. Harper, and N. Dorsey, Esquires, that the defendant had retained and paid them to conduct the defense of the ejectment for his benefit, and also propounded to these witnesses the following question: "Were you retained, at any time, as attorney or counsel, to conduct the ejectment suit above mentioned, on the part of the defendant, for his benefit, as landlord of those premises?"

This question was objected to by the defendant's counsel, as seeking an improper disclosure of professional confidence; and was rejected by the court. Whereupon the plaintiffs excepted.

The plaintiffs then gave in evidence certain deeds and patents, by which, and the admissions of counsel on both sides, the title to the premises in question was vested in John B. Chirac, deceased; and also read in evidence certain depositions to prove who were the heirs of J. B. Chirac; and also offered the record in the ejectment to prove Maria Bonfils to be one of the heirs, and then offered to prove, by parol evidence, that the defendant was, in fact, landlord of the premises at the commencement, and during the progress of the ejectment, and had notice of the *same, and retained [*282 counsel to defend the same, and received the rents and profits thereof during its progress; which last-mentioned evidence the court refused to admit; and the plaintiffs excepted to the refusal.

The plaintiffs then offered to prove the same facts (not saying by parol evidence), with the additional fact that counsel did defend the same action for the benefit of the defendant. This evidence was also rejected by the court, and constituted the third exception of the plaintiffs.

The fourth exception taken by the plaintiffs related to the proper parties to the action. The original plaintiffs in the suit were Anthony Taurin Chirac, Mathew Chapus, and Anna Maria, his wife, Mathew Thevenon and Maria, his wife, and Maria Bonfils, the same persons having been plaintiffs in the ejectment. Pending the suit, the plaintiffs obtained leave to amend their declaration, and amended it by introducing the name of John B. E. Bitarde Desportes, as husband of the said Maria, called, at the commencement of this suit, Maria Bonfils. No objection was taken to this amendment, and the defendant pleaded the general issue to the declaration so amended. The evidence of title of John B. Chirac, deceased, having been introduced, and, also, evidence to prove that Anthony T. Chirac and the female plaintiffs were heirs-at-law of John B. Chirac, the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that they ought to find a verdict for the defendant, unless they were satisfied that all the plaintiffs were the proper heirs-at-law 283*] *of John B. Chirac; which direction the court accordingly gave.

The fifth exception related to the supposed variance between the writ and declaration, by the amendment, introducing the husband of Maria Bonfils as a party upon the record. The court held the variance fatal under the general issue.

Mr. D. Hoffman and Mr. Mayer, for the plaintiffs in error, argued: (1) That the rule as to professional secrecy forbids disclosures by the counsel of matters communicated by the client, after the engagement of counsel, and relating to the merits, or grounds of prosecution or defense of the suit. But that the mere fact of the engagement of counsel was out of the rule, because the privilege and duty of being silent does not arise until that fact be ascertained. The concealment of the real client, who may be the party essentially interested, may be part of the client's policy, and be within the client's instructions to his counsel. But the client's injunction of secrecy, per se, would not make secrecy lawful in this respect; and it is, therefore, a petitio principii to say that the counsel shall not tell who really employed him, merely because it happened to be the direction of his client, and his client's view, to conceal the fact. The law would authorize a fraud on its own rules if it would determine otherwise; and the pretension of the defendant is counter to the whole policy of the rule, as to 284*] professional secrecy.[1] *The very refusal to answer implies the affirmation of the witnesses being employed by the defendant as counsel.

2. The defendant was liable, in this action, if he had notice of the ejectment, and was, as landlord, interested in the result of it. He might, even at common law, have been made defendant; but the statute of 11 Geo. II., in force in Maryland, explicity allows it to him. He shall not screen himself from responsibility, because he had artifice enough to waive appearing, and to let an uninterested person figure as defendant in his stead. The lessor of the plaintiff may sue for mesne profits, and the actual tenant shall be liable, although the judgment in ejectment is obtained against the casual ejector only; and in reference as well to the defendant as to the plaintiff in such a suit, the court disregards the fiction of the ejectment cause. He is answerable for the mesne profits who has received them, and has had an opportunity of defending his pretensions in the preliminary ejectment. The ejectment suit is founded on a fiction. Fictions are under the control of the courts who use them. They will be moulded and applied to the views of justice, and according to reason—for they take their rise from the equity of the law: In fictione juris subsistit equitas. The authorities *sustain all these positions.[2] Before the [*285 statute of 11 Geo. II., regulating the appearance of landlords as defendants in lieu of the casual ejector, a judgment in ejectment was habitually set aside, where, upon the complaint of the landlord, it appeared that he had had no notice of the suit. Where a party sells a chattel with warranty of title, notice to the vendor, of a suit against the vendee for it, is sufficient to bind the vendor by the verdict or judgment in that suit. One obtaining possession of land, while an action of ejectment is pending, is answerable for the mesne profits during his occupation, whether proved to have had notice of the action or not; constructive notice, then, sometimes implicates a third party in this suit.[3] All these rules are calculated to prevent an evasion of the statute, allowing landlords, not in actual possession, to be actors in the ejectment suit, and to keep the fictions of law to their original purposes of justice. Our claim is clear of the point of Lifford's case, in 11 Co. 51; though according to the decisions in Massachusetts we might rest this suit even upon that point.[4] Before the statute of Marlbridge, 52 Hen. III., damages was not recoverable in any *real action, except against the dis- [*286 seisor himself, and then only in the assize of novel disseisin. Hence the practice for the disseisor (similar in principle to the attempt of this defendant) to enfeoff persons to act as defendants, who were not responsible. To prevent this abuse the statute was passed, making all pernors of the profits responsible in real actions for damages.[5] But the action of ejectment, being a personal action in its origin, there was no need of a statuable provision to authorize an award of damages in it. It has taken the place of the real actions of common law. Reinicker, claimant of the fee, must be regarded as in possession; and his tenant's possession was his.

It is true that Chirac appeared as landlord in the ejectment cause. But our purpose is to show that Reinicker appeared by another; and though that other also assumed his (Reinicker's) title, that circumstance serves only to aggravate the fraud attempted upon the law, and to show the more conclusively that Reinicker waived his privilege of defending in his own name, and by candidly announcing his interest on the record. We are not estopped, then, by C. J. F. Chiras's usurpation of the title of landlord, as well as the part of a defendant. If this action were even against him, we should be compelled to prove him landlord, notwithstanding his pretension to the character by appearing as landlord. His appearing might be relied on to prove his being landlord, but only 287*] as a *circumstance, and as evidence, and not as an estoppel. We admit that a party, to be liable for mesne profits, must be a trespasser; and we meant to prove Reinicker, by privity, to be a trespasser. The case in 7 Term. Rep. 108, shows that if the husband there had had notice of the ejectment, he would have been answerable for the mesne profits.

3. The action for mesne profits being the mere sequel of the recovery in the ejectment cause, the record of that recovery is the proper evidence to show the lessors of the plaintiff entitled to the mesne profits so as they are claimed within the terms of the demise in the ejectment. If profits antecedent to the term are asked, then the plaintiffs cannot rely on the ejectment recovery as conclusive evidence, but must prove their title to the land anew, and again open the merits of the ejectment cause. The claim for mesne profits here keeps within the limits of the ejectment demise, and we had no occasion, therefore, to prove our title otherwise than by the record of recovery in the ejectment.[1] Although the husband, who did not appear as a lessor of the plaintiff, is joined in this action with his wife, who was a lessor, still the record of the ejectment is evidence for us, since the husband is no new party in interest. If necessary, this might be enforced by analogy from the writ of re-disseisin in the case of 288*] *a similar change of parties. The addition of the husband, at the utmost, only imposed on us the duty of proving the marriage.

4. A variance between the writ and declaration could only have been taken advantage of upon oyer of the writ, and plea in abatement.[3] Oyer will not now be granted, and such a plea cannot, therefore, obtain. Nor will the proceedings be set aside for irregularity, on account of such a variance.[4] Even supposing, that for this defect the party might have refused to plead, or otherwise have made the objection available, it is too late now since he has pleaded the general issue.[4] A variance of this kind could once have been taken advantage of in England upon writ of error; but that cannot now, since the statute of jeofails, be done there; nor in Maryland, since her act of 1809, ch. 153. Where the writ is, according to the ancient practice, fully recited in the declaration, advantage might be had of the variance on demurrer. But that is not the case here.[5] The recital of the writ in the declaration is unnecessary; and when made, as in this instance, is to be rejected as surplusage.[6] *The [*289 body of the amended declaration here speaks of "the plaintiffs," not of the persons mentioned or named in the recital. Besides, even the recital does not say that Maria Desportes was sued by the name of Maria Bonfils, but only mentions the circumstance of her "being called" so at the bringing of the suit, as it would insert an alias for her name.

The variance occurs in an amended declaration, filed after leave had to amend. The statute of Maryland of 1809, ch. 153, authorizes any amendment to be made "to bring the merits of a suit to issue." This amendment was justified by that act of the legislature; and the court might have made the writ to conform to the alteration, as in England an original writ is made to suit the declaration. The writ, in Maryland, is sometimes altered from debt to case to suit the narr. The husband, here, was joined to the wife only for conformity, and not by reason of a new interest, or as interested; since the suit, if no objection had been made before general issue, might have proceeded in the single name of the wife. One suing by guardian in the first instance, and afterwards becoming of age during the suit, may, and must, appear then by attorney. If the variance could have been, and had been, pleaded in abatement, the court would, under the statute of Maryland, have allowed the declaration to be amended and cleared of the variance. This declaration may be assimilated to a declaration by-the-by, by the husband and wife, though *the writ is sued out in the single name [*290 of the husband.[7] Though a misnomer may be pleaded in abatement, even in England, the narr. and writ may be rectified in that particular upon terms. A party naming himself generally in a writ, may, nevertheless, declare in a special character.[8] The variance between the amended declaration and the first declaration, does not show that the former varies from the writ. The amended declaration is as good evidence of the contents of the writ as the original declaration is.

Mr. D. B. Ogden and Mr. Webster, for the defendant in error, stated, (1) that it was necessary to advert to the specific question which was put as to the defendant's retaining counsel, and to the circumstances under which it was asked. The question involved the disclosure of the party's views, and of his instructions to his counsel, and of communications which were received by him in his capacity of counsel, and that would not have been made to him if he had not been so. It is not necessary that a suit should be pending to bind the counsel to secrecy for his client; any communication, after retainer of counsel, is within the rule against disclosure, if it relates to the suit and is within the scope of the confidence given to the counsel.

2. No person can be made liable for the mesne profits after recovery in ejectment, who

291*] has not *been a trespasser. The ejectment suit complains of a trespass, and the person to be charged for the mesne profits must therefore have been actually a party to that suit by having appeared as defendant, or by having been required to appear by service of process in the suit, and then failing to appear. It is only by this judicial notice, and a waiver of the privilege of appearing, testified by the record of the suit in ejectment, that the defendant in the action for mesne profits can be treated as if he had been a defendant in the ejectment, and adjudged a trespasser, to bear the liability for mesne profits. By mere waiver in pais, or notice extraneous to the record, a party cannot be rendered liable for mesne profits, although, in fact, he may have been interested in the result of the ejectment suit. That interest, however, quoad the ejectment, and in reference to the suit for mesne profits, does not prove him to be a trespasser, which he must be before he can be liable to the claim.[1] The court must look to the record of the ejectment for light as to the responsible parties on the score of mesne profits; they cannot derive it from other quarters, or collateral proof. Hence, too, the record of the ejectment is not evidence of the right of the lessors of the plaintiff to the mesne profits, as against one who was not actually a party in the ejectment suit, nor effectually so by being called on through notice in the process of ejectment to appear as de-
292*] fendant. Here, however, *another person than the defendant, Reinicker, was admitted in the ejectment suit to defend as the landlord of the property in question. He declared himself the landlord in claiming to defend as such; and the plaintiffs in ejectment, not denying his pretension in that respect, have acceded to his representation of himself, and must now be bound by it, and are estopped from saying that any other person was landlord. Reinicker, therefore, can in no wise be connected with the ejectment suit; and at all events, the recovery there is not conclusive against him, that the lessors of the plaintiff are the proper claimants of the mesne profits. They must prove themselves the heirs entitled to the land and to the mesne profits, as the result of that proof. The case from 3 Campb. Rep. 455, does not establish the plaintiffs' positions on these heads. The decision there was on another point; and the reasoning of it shows that the party liable for the mesne profits must be a trespasser. The action for mesne profits will lie only where trespass quare clausum fregit would lie. According to that principle, Reinicker could not, by mere force of notice in pais of the suit, be held liable for the mesne profits.

3. The case as to the amended declaration is clear of all the learing respecting the mode of taking advantage of a variance between the declaration and the writ. The variance there meant, is not such a departure from the writ as in this case, as it effects an entire change of suit, and substitutes, in reality, a new suit for 293*] *that which the writ and first declaration defined. There is no declaration here in the suit which was originally brought; or at least, that which was a declaration has not been acted on; but the issue is taken, and the jury sworn, between new parties, and out of the suit which the record professes to carry on. The court may, therefore, take notice of the change of parties, and of claim, and of suit, in this case; since they cannot fail to see between what parties they are adjudicating; and it is not necessary that the inconsistency be brought to their knowledge by a plea in abatement exclusively. It does not appear that Maria Bonfils was unmarried at the time of bringing the suit.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass for mesne profits, brought by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant in error in the Circuit Court for the district of Maryland. The cause comes before this court upon exceptions taken by the plaintiffs on the trial of the cause in the court below.

The plaintiffs had recovered judgment, and possession of the premises, in an ejectment, in which J. C. F. Chirac prayed to be admitted as landlord to defend the premises, and was admitted accordingly under the common consent rule. The record of the proceedings in that action were offered by the plaintiffs as evidence in the present suit; and they then offered to prove, by the testimony of R. G. Harper, and W. Dorsey, *Esquires, that the defend- [*294 ant had retained and paid them to conduct the defense of the ejectment for his benefit, and also propounded to these witnesses the following question: "Were you retained, at any time, as attorney or counselor, to conduct the ejectment suit above mentioned, on the part of the defendant, for the benefit of the said George Reinicker, as landlord of those premises?" This question was objected to as seeking an improper disclosure of professional confidence. The court sustained the objection; and this constitutes the first ground of exception.

The general rule is not disputed, that confidential communications between client and attorney are not to be revealed at any time. The privilege, indeed, is not that of the attorney, but of the client; and it is indispensable for the purposes of private justice. Whatever facts, therefore, are communicated by a client to counsel, solely on account of that relation, such counsel are not at liberty, even if they wish, to disclose; and the law holds their testimony incompetent. The real dispute in this case is, whether the question did involve the disclosure of professional confidence. If the question had stopped at the inquiry whether the witnesses were employed by Reinicker, as counsel, to conduct the ejectment suit, it would deserve consideration, whether it could be universally affirmed that it involved any breach of professional confidence. The fact is preliminary in its own nature, and establishes only the existence of the relation of *client and [*295 counsel, and therefore might not necessarily involve the disclosure of any communication arising from that relation after it was created. But the question goes farther. It asks, not only whether the witnesses were employed, but whether they were employed by Reinicker to conduct the ejectment for him, as landlord of the premises. We are all of opinion that the question, in this form, does involve a disclosure of confidential communications. It seeks a disclosure of the title and claim set up by Reinicker to his counsel, for the purpose of conducting the defense of the suit. It cannot be pretended that counsel could be asked what were the communications made by Reinicker as to the nature, extent or grounds of his title; and yet, in effect, the question, in the form in which it is put, necessarily involves such a disclosure. The Circuit Court was, therefore, right in their decision on this point.

The plaintiffs then gave in evidence certain deeds and patents, by which, and the admissions of counsel on both sides, the title to the premises in question was vested in John B. Chirac, deceased; and also gave in evidence certain depositions to prove who were the heirs of J. B. Chirac, and also offered the record in the ejectment to prove Maria Bonfils to be one of the heirs; and then offered to prove, by parol evidence, that the defendant was, in fact, landlord of the premises at the commencement and during the progress of the ejectment, and had notice of the same, and employed counsel to 296*] defend *the same; and received the rents and profits thereof, during the progress of the ejectment; which evidence the court refused to admit; and this constitutes the second exception of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs then offered to prove the same facts (not saying by parol evidence), with the additional fact that counsel did defend the same action for the benefit of the defendant. This evidence was also rejected by the court, and constitutes the third exception of the plaintiffs.

The question of law involved in each of these exceptions is substantially the same. It is, whether a person, who was not a party to the ejectment, and did not take upon himself, upon the record, the defense thereof, but another did as landlord, may yet be liable in an action for the mesne profits, upon its being proved that he was, in fact, the landlord, received the rents and profits, and resisted the recovery.

It is undoubtedly true, that in general, a recovery in ejectment, like other judgments, binds only parties and privies. It is conclusive evidence in an action for mesne profits against the tenant in possession, when he has been duly served with a notice in ejectment, whether he appears, and takes upon himself the defense, or suffers judgment to go by default against the casual ejector. The reason is, that in the first case he is the real party on the record; in the last he is considered as substantially the defendant, and the judgment by default, as a confession of the title set up in the ejectment. 297*] Such was the decision *of the court in Aislin v. Parkin, in 1 Burr. 667. But in relation to third persons the judgment in ejectment is not conclusive; and if they are sued in an action for mesne profits, which is substantially an action against them as trespassers, they may controvert the plaintiff's title at large. In such a suit, the record of the ejectment is not evidence to establish the plaintiff's title; but it seems admissible for another purpose, that is to say, to show the possession of the plaintiff. The plaintiff may certainly prove his possession connected with his title, by any sufficient evidence in pais; and if his possession has been under a judgment of law, he is entitled to establish it by introducing the record of the recovery, and an executed writ of possession under it.

The question, then, is, generally, whether it is competent for the plaintiff to maintain an action for mesne profits against any person who is in possession of the land by means of his tenants, and who, by his acts, commands, or co-operation, aids in the expulsion of the plaintiff, and in withholding possession from him. All persons who aid in, or command, or procure a trespass, are themselves deemed in law to be trespassers, whether they are actually present, or do the act through the instrumentality of their agents and servants. A recovery of the possession, in an ejectment against one of such agents, does not constitute a bar to an action for mesne profits against another agent, for the same reason that *the former suit is no bar to the latter [*298 against the defendant in ejectment, viz., that the mesne profits were not a matter in controversy in the ejectment. If, then, it is competent to maintain the action for mesne profits against any trespasser, although not a defendant in ejectment, it is competent to prove that the defendant is in that predicament. The evidence offered, in this case, was strong to prove the fact that the defendant was a party to the trespass, supposing the plaintiffs to have established their title and possession. If he was landlord of the premises, and the other parties were in possession under him; if he was in the perception of the rents and profits; if he resisted the plaintiff's title and possession, and co-operated in the acts of the tenants for this purpose, the evidence was proper for the jury as proof of his being a co-trespasser.

This doctrine is supported by the case of Hunter v. Britts, 3 Campb. N. P. Rep. 455, which was cited at the bar. There the judgment was against the casual ejector in the ejectment suit, and the action for the mesne profits was brought against Britts as landlord; and he was proved to be in the receipt of the rents and profits from the time of the demise till the writ of possession was executed. The ejectment was served upon the tenant; there was no evidence that Britts had any notice of this till after judgment; but, subsequently, he promised to pay the rent, and the costs, to the plaintiff. It was objected, that the judgment in ejectment was not, under these circumstances, evidence of *title against [*299 Britts; and Lord Ellenborough held that it was not, without notice of the ejectment. But he thought that his subsequent promise amounted to an admission that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises, and that he himself was a trespasser. The language of the learned judge seems, indeed, to import that if the landlord had had notice of the ejectment, he would have been concluded by the recovery in the ejectment. It might be so, if the common notice had been formally given to him as tenant in possession, and he had neglected to take upon himself the defense of the suit. If, however, the notice was in pais, and conduced merely to prove his actual knowledge of the suit, without calling upon him to defend it, we are not prepared to admit that, on general principles, it ought to have such an effect.[1] But the point actually decided was, that a party might be charged, in an action for mesne profits, who was not, in any sense, a party to the ejectment, by establishing the title against him, and showing his connection as landlord with the tenant in possession, and his adoption of the acts of the latter.

But, it is said that assuming the law to be so in general, yet in the present case the plaintiffs are estopped from setting up the fact that the defendant was the real landlord, because, in the ejectment, one J. C. F. Chirac prayed leave of the court, "as landlord of the premises, to be made defendant" in the place of the casual ejector, which was, with the consent of the les- 300*] see of *the plaintiffs, allowed by the court. It does not appear to us that any such estoppel arises from this allegation in the record. The record itself ecrtainly does not constitute a technical estoppel, for it is res inter alios acta. The most that can be said is, that it is proper evidence to prove who the plaintiffs at that time deemed to be landlord, and, therefore, admissible to rebut the presumption that the present defendant was the landlord. But, certainly, the evidence was not conclusive upon either party. It was open to the plaintiffs to show that, in point of fact, the present defendant was the real landlord, that the admission in the record was founded in mistake of the facts, or that J. C. F. Chirac was a sub-landlord under Reinicker, or his superior landlord. What would have been the effect of such proof is not for this court to determine. We think, then, that the evidence offered by the plaintiffs was admissible upon general principles; and we see no estoppel which excludes it in this particular case. The directions of the Circuit Court were, on this point, erroneous.

If it had appeared upon the record, that the evidence offered by the plaintiffs was solely to connect the defendant with the ejectment, so that the recovery would be conclusive upon him in the same manner as if he had been a party on the record, and, as such, admitted to defend, and actually defending the suit, the case might have required a very different consideration. We have already intimated an opinion that notice of an ejectment suit, or de- 301*] fense of the suit, by a *person not tenant in possession, or defendant on record, does not make him a party to the suit in contemplation of law, so as to conclude his rights.

In considering the fourth and fifth exceptions, it is necessary to advert to the fact that the plaintiffs in this action originally were Anthony Taurin Chirac, Matthew Chapus and Anna Maria, his wife, Matthew Thevenon and Maria, his wife, and Maria Bonfils, the same persons having been plaintiffs in the ejectment. During the pendency of the suit the plaintiffs obtained leave to amend their declaration, and did amend it, by introducing the name of John B. E. Bitarde Desportes, as husband of the said Maria, called, at the commencement of this suit Maria Bonfils. To this amendment no objection was taken, and the defendant pleaded to the declaration, so amended, the general issue. The evidence of title of John B. Chirac, deceased, being introduced, and also evidence to prove that Anthony T. Chirac and the female plaintiffs were heirs-at-law of John B. Chirac, the defendant then prayed the court to direct the jury "that they ought to find a verdict for the defendant, unless they are satisfied that all the plaintiffs are the proper heirs-at-law of the aforesaid John B. Chirac," which direction the court accordingly gave. The probable intention of the defendant was to pray an instruction to the jury, that unless all those of the plaintiffs who claimed to be heirs of John B. Chirac, should establish their title, the suit could not be maintained. In this view, the opinion of *the court would be correct, [*302 for it is a general rule that no recovery can be had unless all the plaintiffs are competent to maintain the suit. If, therefore, the title fails as to one, it is not maintainable in favor of the others. The proof does not, under such circumstances, meet the case set up in the declaration. But, framed as this exception actually is, the direction given by the court is, in its terms, erroneous. It was not necessary to prove that all the plaintiffs are the proper heirs-at-law of J. B. Chirac. The action was maintainable if the husbands were not the proper heirs of J. B. Chirac; for, in right of their wives, they were proper parties to the suit. The fourth exception is therefore well taken.

The fifth exception is founded on the supposed variance between the writ and declaration, by the amendment, introducing the husband of Maria Bonfils upon the record. The court held this variance fatal under the general issue. It is observable that this amendment was made under an order of the court, and was not objected to, on the record, by the defendant; and that the general issue was subsequently pleaded. It has been decided in this court, that the allowance or disallowance of amendments is not matter for which a writ of error lies here. Variances between the writ and declaration are, in general matters, proper for pleas in abatement; and if, in any case, a variance between the writ and declaration can be taken advantage of by the defendant in the court below, it seems to be an established rule that it cannot be done except *upon [*303 oyer of the original writ, granted in some proper stage of the cause. The existence of sush variance forms no matter of controversy upon the general issue, by which the jury are to be governed in forming their verdict. In the present case, as no objection was taken to the amendment upon the record, it must be deemed to have been waived by the defendant, and therefore not proper to be insisted upon at the trial.[1] It does not appear on the record, whether Maria Bonfils was married before or pending the suit; and the fact might have a material bearing upon the propriety of granting the amendment, since, at all events, if pending the suit, it would not of itself abate the suit; and the objection could only be made available by a plea in abatement.[2]

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that there is error in the directions of the Circuit Court in the four last exceptions, and contained in the record, and for this cause the judgment must be reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

304*] [*Practice. Chancery. Mortgage.]

FINLEY, Appellant,
v.
THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS and COMPANY of THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, Respondents.

Although, in general, all encumbrancers must be made parties to a bill of foreclosure, yet where a decree of foreclosure and sale was made and executed, at the suit of a subsequent mortgagee, and with the consent of the mortgageor, it not appearing to the court that there was any prior encumbrance, the proceedings will not be set aside upon the application of the mortgageor, in order to let in the prior mortgagee, who ought regularly to have been made a party, unless it be necessary to prevent irremediable mischief.

Quære, Whether such a practice be admissible in any case.

But in such a case the prior encumbrancers are not bound by the decree in a suit to which they are not made parties; and the purchasers under the sale take subject to the prior liens.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Bibb for the appellant,[1] and by Mr. Webster for the respondents.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

305*] *This is a bill in chancery brought by the Bank of the United States against James Finley, to obtain a decree for the sale of property mortgaged for the security of a debt due to the bank.

The mortgage deed was executed on the 28th of September, 1822, and contains a recital of debts due to the bank to the amount of $6,240, on account of which a note was executed on that day to the bank for that sum, payable sixty days after date. At the November term of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, the bill was filed, stating the consent of the mortgagor to an immediate sale of the mortgaged property, although the day of payment was not arrived; and on the same day an answer was filed consenting to a decree for the sale. A decree was immediately entered, by consent of parties, directing the marshal to sell the property. The court then proceeds to direct the marshal, after deducting the expenses of sale, his commission, and the costs, to pay to the bank the sum of $6,240, with interest from the date of the note. The sale was made in pursuance of the decree, and the report thereof was returned to the court by the marshal.

At the succeeding term, William Coleman filed his petition, stating, among other things, that he held a prior mortgage on the same lands, and praying that he might be made a party defendant to the suit. His petition was rejected, and he prayed an appeal to this court, 306*] which *has been dismissed as irregularly granted. After dismissing this petition, the Circuit Court pronounced a decree affirming the sale made by the marshal, and directing the credit to which Finley should be entitled for the money paid out of its proceeds to the bank. This decree also considers the debt due to the bank as amounting to $6,240, with interest from the date of the note.

The mortgage to Coleman is filed, and appears to be dated three days anterior to that made to the bank. A suit to obtain a sale of the premises was instituted in the State Court in March, 1823, and was depending when the final decree was pronounced at the suit of the bank. After the final decree had been pronounced, Finley filed a petition, praying that the sale and decree might be set aside, alleging, among other reasons therefor, that Coleman, the prior mortgagee, had not been made a party, although the existence of his mortgage was known to the bank.

The prayer of the petition was rejected, and Finley has appealed to this court. The counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that this decree ought to be reversed, because it was pronounced in a case in which proper parties were not before the court.

It cannot be doubted that Coleman ought regularly to have been a party defendant, and that had the existence of his mortgage been known to the court, no decree ought to have been pronounced in the cause until he was introduced into it. But this fact was kept out of view until *the decree was pronounced, [*307 the sale made, the money paid to the creditor, and the report of his proceedings returned by the marshal. If the manner in which the sale was made, and the money directed to be paid, be unusual and exceptional, it was done by consent, and the error is not imputable to the court. The only question presented to judges by this petition was, whether a decree, completely executed by a sale of the property and payment of the purchase money, should be set aside, and the suit re-instated for the purpose of introducing a party who ought regularly to have been an original defendant, but who was not shown, by any proceedings in the cause, to be concerned in interest until the decree was made and executed. There would certainly be great inconvenience in such a practice; and, if it be admissible in any case, on which the court gives no opinion, it must be where the mischief resulting from a rejection of the petition would be irremediable. This is not shown to be a case of that description. Coleman's mortgage cannot be affected by this decree. His rights cannot be extinguished by it. His suit in the State Court will proceed as if this decree had never been pronounced. The purchasers under the decree of the Circuit Court take the land subject to prior encumbrances, and have probably taken this encumbrance into consideration in the price given for the land. But, be this as it may, they do not complain, or object to their purchase, in consequence of the cloud hanging over the title. Coleman's rights cannot *be affected; [*308 and if Finley has suffered by selling his land subject to a lien, it is an injury which he has knowingly brought upon himself. This is not, then, a case for such an extraordinary measure as opening a decree made by consent, after it has been carried into execution, on the petition of the party who has given that consent. We do not think the decree is erroneous because the prior mortgagee was not made a defendant, the fact not having appeared to the court until the decree was completely executed.

But in the disposition of the money produced by the sale, a small mistake appears to have been made. There were some previous debts due from Finley to the bank, amounting to $6,240, which appear to have been absorbed in the note given for that sum on the 28th of September, 1822, payable sixty days after date, to secure the payment of which the mortgage deed was executed. If this note carried interest from its date, that fact does not appear, and cannot be presumed. The mortgage deed does not purport to secure the payment of such interest. Yet the decree of the Circuit Court subjects the mortgaged property to its payment. This error ought to be corrected, and may yet be corrected in the Circuit Court. It does not affect the sale. In all other respects the decree is to be affirmed.

Decree.—This cause came on to be argued, etc. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that there is no error in the decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises in the bill 309*] *mentioned, the same being made by consent; nor in the final decree confirming the report of the marshal, except so far as it directs that the note in the deed of mortgage mentioned should carry interest from its date, whereas interest should be computed from the day on which the said note was made payable, which was sixty days after its date. The said decree, therefore, is erroneous, so far as respects the computation of interest before the said note became payable, and is so far reversed, and is, in all other respects, affirmed. And the cause is remanded to the said Circuit Court, that the said decree may be reformed so far as it is herein declared to be erroneous. And the parties are to pay their own costs.

WETZELL v. BUSSARD.

An acknowledgment of a debt which will take a case out of the statute of limitations, must be unqualified and unconditional.

If it be connected with circumstances which, in any manner, affect the claim, or if it be conditional, it may amount to a new assumpsit, for which the old debt is a sufficient consideration; or if it be construed to revive the original debt, that revival is conditional, and the performance of the condition, or a readiness to perform it, must be shown.

Thus, where an action was brought, on a promise in writing to deliver a quantity of powder, and the original assumpsit being satisfactorily proved, the defendant relied upon the statute of limitations; *and one witness deposed that [*310 the defendant told him that the plaintiff need not have sued him; for if he had come forward and settled certain claims which defendant had against him, the defendant would have given him his powder. To another witness defendant said that he should be ready to deliver the powder whenever the plaintiff settled a suit which Dr. E. had brought against him, etc. Held, that those declarations did not amount to an unqualified and unconditional acknowledgment of the debt, but that the plaintiff ought to have proved a performance, or a readiness to perform the condition on which the new promise was made.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Swann for the plaintiff,[1] and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Key for the defendant.[2]

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and county of Washington, on a promise in writing to deliver a quantity of powder. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and the statute of limitations. The original assumpsit having been satisfactorily proved, the plaintiff, to support the second issue, introduced a witness who swore that the defendant, in a conversation with him soon after the commencement of the suit, said that the plaintiff need not have sued him, for if he had come forward and settled certain claims which the defendant had against him, the defendant would have given him *his powder. To another witness who [*311 spoke to him before the commencement of the suit, at the instance of the plaintiff, he said that he should be ready to deliver the powder whenever the plaintiff settled a suit which Doctor Ewell had brought against him in the District Court of Alexandria. Other witnesses proved declarations of the same import.

The defendant demurrer to this testimony, and the plaintiff joined in demurrer. The court gave judgment in favor of the defendant; and the plaintiff has brought his cause, by a writ of error, into this court.

It is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that he has proved an acknowledgment of the debt, and that such acknowledgment, according to a long series of decisions, revives the original promise, or lays a foundation on which the law raises a new promise.

1.—He cited Swan v. Sowell, 2 Barnw. and Ald. Rep. 759; Leaper v. Tatton, 16 East's Rep. 420; Salk. 29; Slubry v. Champlin, 4 Johns. Rep. 461.

2.—They cited Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch, 72; Bush v. Barnard, 8 Johns. Rep. 407.

NOTE.—Statute of limitations.

As to limitations of actions in equity cases, see note to Thomas v. Hawes, 10 Wheat. 146.

A new promise which will remove the bar of the statute of limitations must be positive and unequivocal; and if a new promise is to be raised by implication of law from an acknowledgment, there must be an unqualified acknowledgment of a subsisting debt, in unequivocal language, which the party is liable and willing to pay. Van Kemen v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 523; Bloodgood v. Bruen, 8 N. Y. 362; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351; Hulbert v. Nichol, 20 Hun. 454; 15 Wend. 284.

To take the case out of the statute of limitations by an acknowledgment or promise, a present indebtedness must be admitted, which the party is willing to pay, and an express promise to pay, or evidence from which an implied promise may be fairly inferred. Arnold v. Dexter, 4 Mas. 122; Bk. of Alexandria v. Clarke, 2 Cranch, C. C. 464; Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch, 72; Moore v. Bk. of Columbia, 6 Pet. 86; Otterback v. Brown, 2 McArthur, 541; Cowen v. Magauran, Wall, Jr. C. C. 66; Jenkins v. Boyle, 2 Cranch, C. C. 120; Young v. Wetzel, 3 Cranch, C. C. 358; Thompson v. Peters, 12 Wheat. 565; Moore v. Bk. of Col. 6

The English, as well as American books, are filled with decisions which support this general proposition. An unqualified admission that the debt is due at the time, has always been held to remove the bar created by the statute. But where the terms of the acknowledgment are in any degree equivocal, or where some qualification has been annexed to the admission, the question whether the declarations of the party amount to an acknowledgment, of an existing debt on which the law will raise an assumpsit, has been differently determined.

Leaper v. Tatton, 16 East's Rep. 420, was a suit against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, 312*] *who pleaded the statute of limitations. At the trial, the plaintiff offered a witness who swore that the defendant, when applied to for payment, said that he had been liable, but was not liable then, because the bill was out of date. He acknowledged his acceptance, but said he would not pay it; that it was not in his power to pay it. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff; and, on a motion for a new trial, Lord Ellenborough said: "As to the sufficiency of the evidence of the promise, it was an acknowledgment by the defendant that he had not paid the bill, and that he could not pay it; and as the limitation of the statute is only a presumptive payment, if his own acknowledgment that he has not paid be shown, it does away the statute." Bayley, J., said the acknowledgment was evidence of a debt: acknowledging his acceptance, and that he had not paid it, creates a debt. The rule was discharged.

Although, in this case, the defendant did not expressly admit the existence of the debt, the implication is irresistible. The reason he assigns for not being liable is, that the bill is out of date, and his reason for not paying it is his inability. The court so understood the testimony; and Lord Ellenborough speaks of his acknowledgment as amounting to an admission that he had not paid the bill, and could not pay it.

In the case of Swan v. Sowell, 3 Barnw. & Ald. 759, Bayley, J., says that if a party admits the debt, and does not say that it is satisfied, or refuses to pay it, alleging at the time an insufficient excuse for not paying it, the law will, in *these cases, raise an implied [*313 promise to pay the debt then acknowledged to be due.

The language of Mr. Justice Bayley is not entirely free from doubt. If, by "insufficient excuse," he means an excuse which in itself implies an admission that the debt remains due except for the bar created by the act of limitations, the proposition is undoubtedly supported by the general course of the cases. But if his declaration extends to an excuse which, if true, furnishes a real objection to the payment of the claim, in whole or in part, we think it is laid down too broadly.

Both the English and American cases are very well summed up in a note in 4 Johns. Rep. 469, note b. The current of the English decisions seems to be in favor of the principle that any expressions which amount to an admission that the debt was originally due, and has not been paid, will remove the bar created by the act, and revive the original assumpsit. The decisions, however, as to this point, have not been entirely uniform. In Coltman v. Marsh, 3 Taunt. Rep. 380, on a motion to set aside a nonsuit in a case in which the statute of limitations had been pleaded, it appeared that the defendant had said to the plaintiff, "I owe you not a farthing, for it is more than six years since." It was contended that these words ought to have been left to the jury; but the court refused the motion. So, in the case of Leaper v. Tatton, 16 East's Rep. 420, the defendant said "that he had been liable, 314*] *but was not liable then, because the bill was out of date." Lord Ellenborough held, at Nisi Pruis, that this might be considered as no more "than pleading the statute of limitations in his own person;" and the verdict was taken on other words spoken at the same time. Yet these words imply very strongly that the debt was originally due, and remains unpaid.

Some of the American cases proceed on the idea of a new promise, for which the ancient debt is a sufficient consideration; and this is a distinction of great importance, where the acknowledgment is connected with anything required by the defendant.

In the case of Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch's Rep. 72, this court expressed the opinion that the doctrine of reviving debts barred by the act of limitations, had been carried full as far as it ought to be carried, and that the statutes on that subject ought to be construed like other statutes, so as to effect the intention of the legislature. In that case, a declaration by one partner that the account was originally due, and that he had never paid it, and did not know that it had ever been paid, but supposed his partner had discharged it, was declared to be insufficient to take the case out of the statute. It is true that the partnership was dissolved when this declaration was made, but the court did not put the case on that point. It was determined on the insufficiency of the acknowledgment. We think, upon the principles expressed by the court in 315*] the case in 8 Cranch's Rep. that an *acknowledgment which will revive the original cause of action must be unqualified and unconditional. It must show positively that the debt is due in whole or in part. If it be connected with circumstances which in any manner affect the claim, or, if it be conditional, it may amount to a new assumpsit for which the old debt is a sufficient consideration; or if it be construed to revive the original debt, that revival is conditional, and the performance of the condition, or a readiness to perform it, must be shown.

In the case at bar, the defendant said to one witness that if the plaintiff had come forward and settled certain claims the defendant had against him he would have given him his powder; and to another he said "he should be ready to deliver the powder whenever the plaintiff settled a suit which Doctor Ewell had brought against defendant in the court of Alexandria, on account of a patent-right and machine sold to him by the plaintiff."

These declarations do not amount to an unqualified and unconditional acknowledgment that the original debt was justly demandable. They assert a counter claim on the part of the defendant, which he was determined to oppose to that of the plaintiff. He did not mean to give validity to the plaintiff's claim, but on condition that his own should be satisfied. These declarations, therefore, cannot be construed into a revival of the original cause of action, unless that be done on which the revival was made to depend. It may be considered as a new promise, for which *the [*316 old debt is a sufficient consideration, and the plaintiff ought to prove a performance, or a readiness to perform, the condition on which the promise was made.

A distinction seems to have been taken in England between a promise to pay a sum of money, and a contract for the performance of a particular act. In Boydell v. Drummond, 2 Campb. N. P. Rep. 157, Lord Ellenborough written promise with the original debt. Isley v. Jewitt, 2 Metc. 168, 173.

Promise to pay when able is insufficient without evidence of the ability to pay. Thompkins v. Brown, 1 Den. 247; Chandler v. Glover, 32 Penn. St. 509.

Ability to pay may be inferred from circumstances, as that he was in business and kept open store. Lonsdale v. Brown, 4 Wash. C. C. 86; Everson v. Carpenter, 17 Wend. 419, 422.

Defendant may controvert his ability to pay. Duffie v. Phillips, 31 Ala. 571.

The statute requiring a new promise to be in writing does not prescribe any new rule of evidence of part payment; and part payment may be proved by oral admissions of the debtor. First Nat. Bank v. Ballou, 49 N. Y. 155; 2 Lans, 120; Smith v. Ryan, 66 N. Y. 352.

Part payment must be of something of value, and not a mere indorsement or deduction, and under circumstances showing a recognition of the debt and a willingness to pay it. Blanchard v. Blanchard, 122 Mass. 558; S. C. 23 Am. R. 397; Smith v. Ryan, 66 N. Y. 352; Pickett v. King, 34 Barb. 193; Harper v. Fairley, 53 N. Y. 442; Livermore v. Rand, 26 N. H. 85.

Compulsory payment is not enough. Morgan v. Reynolds, L. R. 7 B. 493; S. C., 2 Moak's Eng. 611, and cas. cit.

The effect of part payment is not impaired by evidence that he supposed the part payment would extinguish the whole. Carrington v. Crocker, 37 N. Y. 336; S. C. 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 335.

But the effect of part payment may be repelled by proof showing that the debtor, at the time of making it, expressly disputed the balance or the item now contested. Peck v. N. Y. etc., S. Co. 5 Bosw. 226, 237.

An indorsement is sufficient to go to the jury, if in the handwriting of defendant, or of the creditor who is since deceased. Risley v. Wightman, 13 Hun, 163 165; Roseborn v. Billington, 17 John. 182; See also Knight v. Clements, 45 Ala. 89.

When an executor inserted in the inventory of the estate, a note given by himself, which was then outlawed, held sufficient acknowledgment in writing. Morrow v. Morrow, 12 Hun, 386; Ross v. Ross, 6 Hun, 80; Kincaid v. Archibald, 10 Hun, 9; 73 N. Y. 189; Heath v. Grennell, 61 Barb. 190; Clark v. Van Amburg, 14 Hun. 557.

A note indorsed by defendant as part payment, or as security for part of his indebtedness, is sufficient. Smith v. Ryan, 66 N. Y. 352.

So, payment of interest by one of two joint debtors, by direction of the other. Haight v. Avery, 16 Hun, 252.

The partial payment must be clearly established, and not a matter of conjecture. Hulbert v. Nicol, 20 Hun, 454; Burr v. Burr, 26 Penn. 284; Barclay's Appeal, 64 Penn. 69; Knight v. Clements, 45 Ala. 89.

The code of N. Y. does not require that the time when the acknowledgment or promise was made should appear in the writing, and parol evidence of date, or to correct an error in a date, may be given. Kincaid v. Archibald, 73 N. Y. 189.

As to when payment will be construed as a new promise removing the bar of the statute, see Bowe v. Gano, 9 Hun, 6; Smith v. Velie, 60 N. Y. 106; Rich v. Niag. Sav. Bk., 3 Hun, 481; Pursell v. Fry, 19 Hun. 595.

Mere proof of plaintiff's account containing credits in favor of defendant without other proof of an account or demand in favor of defendant against the plaintiff, will not take the case out of the statute. Cuck v. Quackenbush, 13 Hun. 107; see Davis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 52.

An admission in a letter written on Sunday, that a debt is unpaid is sufficient to remove the bar of the statute. Ayers v. Bane, 30 Iowa, 508; see Thomas v. Hunter, 29 Md. 406.

said: "If a man acknowledges the existence of a debt barred by the statute, the law has been supposed to raise a new promise to pay it, and thus the remedy is revived; but no such effect can be given to an acknowledgment where the cause of action arises from the doing, or omitting to do, some act, at a particular moment, in breach of a contract."

But, without placing the cause on this distinction, the court is of opinion that the original cause of action is not revived, and that there is no error in the judgment.

v.

THE COMMON COUNCIL OF ALEXANDRIA.

No judgment can be rendered upon a demurrer to evidence until there is a joinder in demurrer; and issue cannot be joined upon the demurrer so long as there is any matter of fact in controversy between the parties.

The demurrer to evidence must state facts, and not merely the evidence conducing to prove them.

One party cannot insist upon the other party joining in demurrer, without distinctly admitting, upon the record, every fact, and every conclusion, which the evidence given for his adversary conduced to prove.

Where the demurrer to evidence is defective in these respects, and judgment has, notwithstanding, been rendered upon it for the party demurring, by the court below, the judgment will be reversed in this court, and a new trial awarded.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Webster and Mr. Swan for the plaintiff,[2] and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Taylor for the defendants. But, as it was determined by the court upon the defects in the demurrer to evidence, it has not been thought necessary to report the arguments of counsel.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

*This is a writ of error from the Cir- [*321
cuit Court sitting at Alexandria for the District of Columbia. The original action was brought against the defendants to recover damages asserted to have been sustained by the plaintiff, in consequence of the neglect of the defendants to take due bonds and security from one Phillip G. Marsteller, licensed by them as an auctioneer for the years 1815, 1816, 1817 and 1818, according to the express provisions of the statute in this behalf enacted.

At the trial below, upon the general issue, one of the principal points in controversy was, whether the said Marsteller was, in fact, licensed by the defendants as an auctioneer during the years above stated; and both parties introduced a good deal of evidence for the purpose of supporting or repelling the presumption of the fact. The defendants demurred to the evidence as insufficient to maintain the plaintiff's action, and the record itself contains

1.—The courts both in this country and in England, have frequently expressed their regret that, in construing the statute of limitations, the original text had not been more strictly adhered to, so as to effectuate the intention of the legislature, proceeding upon the reasonable presumption furnished by the lapse of time and upon the salutary policy of discouraging vexatious litigation. See Bryan v. Horsman, 4 East's Rep. 599; Ward v. Hunter, 6 Taunt. Rep. 210; Brandran v. Wharton, 1 Barnw. & Ald. 463; Bartley v. Faulkner, 3 Barnw. & Ald. 288. Mr. Evans, in the notes to his Translation of Pothier on Obligations, speaking of Bryan v. Horsman, has the following observations, 317*] which *are marked by the independent spirit of that able writer; "The decision was certainly in conformity with the series of precedents upon the subject; but, as to the general precedent of adhering to the mere authority of former cases, in opposition to the positive terms of an act of parliament, or an established maxim of law, of placing a secondary above a primary authority, much doubt may fairly, and without disrespect, be entertained. Where the return to the ancient principle would be attended with material detriment, as by disturbing titles to real estates held under the sanction of rules which, however erroneous in themselves, have been established by a series of precedents, the reason for an adherence to the precedents evidently preponderates; but where there will be no immediate inconvenience beyond the immediate case, where the general consequences will be wholly prospective, I cannot but adhere to the opinion (which I have, perhaps, expressed with obtrusive repetition) that the courts of justice have as much authority now to restore the law as they have had before to subvert it: and that a correct principle of law is an authority entitled to a higher respect than an erroneous set of precedents. Considering the law, however, upon this particular subject as now beyond the reach of argument, and aware how much my own opinion, upon the effect of precedent, is different from that which usually prevails in practice, I think it not irrelevant to suggest to persons whose claims are barred by the statute, and who wish to obtain an acknowledgment of the subsistence of the debt, and utility of filing a bill of discovery, obliging the defendant to state whether the debt was contracted, and whether it has been paid. If the subsistence of the debt is admitted, and without perjury it cannot be denied, it will not, if there is any consistency of decision, be of any avail to add a claim to the protection of the statute." 2 Evans' transl. Pothier Oblig. Appendix, No. XV., p. 125, note b. Mr. Serjeant Williams also remarks that, "after all, it might, perhaps, have been as well if the letter of the statute had been strictly adhered to; it is an extremely beneficial law, on which, as it has been observed, the security of all men depends, and is, therefore, to be favored. Green v. Revitt, 2 Salk. Rep. 421, 422. And although it will now and then prevent a man from recovering an honest debt, yet it is his own fault that he postponed his action so long; beside which, the permitting of evidence of promises and acknowledgments, within the six years, seems to *be a dangerous inlet to [*318 perjury." 2 Williams' Saund. 64 b, note.

In the countries governed by the Roman civil law, a much more liberal rule of interpretation has been always applied to their ordinances of prescription or limitation. Thus, in France, though a positive acknowledgment of the debt is sufficient to interrupt the running of the prescription, yet a verbal acknowledgment, when the debt exceeds 100 livres can be of no use to the creditor, as the French law requires all contracts exceeding that amount (now 150 francs, Code Civ. Nap. No. 1341) to be in writing; and this statute of frauds has also been very strictly adhered to by the courts of justice in that country. Pothier, Des Oblig. No. 660, 688; Erskine's Inst. Law of Scotland b. 3, tit. 7, s. 10. But what is called the de-

2.—They cited, as to the liability of corporations in a private action for neglect of their duties, and consequent damages sustained by individuals, Yarborough v. Bank of England, 16 East's Rep. 6, and Riddle v. Proprietors, etc. 7 Mass. Rep. 169.

the whole evidence introduced at the trial, as well that arising from the testimony of witnesses as that arising from written documents. There is no joinder in demurrer on the record, which is probably a mere defect in the transcript, as the court proceeded to give judgment upon the demurrer, in favor of the defendants. Without a joinder in demurrer, no such judgment could be properly entered; and such joinder ought not to have been required or permitted while there was any matter of fact in controversy between the parties.

322*] *Indeed, the nature of the proceedings upon a demurrer to evidence seems to have been totally misunderstood in the present case. It is no part of the object of such proceedings to bring before the court an investigation of the facts in dispute, or to weigh the force of testimony or the presumptions arising from the evidence. That is the proper province of the jury. The true and proper object of such a demurrer is to refer to the court the law arising from facts. It supposes, therefore, the facts to be already admitted and ascertained, and that nothing remains but for the court to apply the law to those facts. This doctrine is clearly established by the authorities, and is expounded in a very able manner by Lord Chief Justice Eyre; in delivering the opinion of all the judges in the case of Gibson v. Hunter, before the House of Lords. 2 H. Bl. Rep. 187. It was there held that no party could insist upon the other party's joining in demurrer, without distinctly admitting, upon the record, every fact, and every conclusion, which the evidence given for his adversary conduced to prove. If, therefore, there is parol evidence in the case which is loose and indeterminate, and may be applied with more or less effect to the jury, or evidence of circumstances which is meant to operate beyond the proof of the existence of those circumstances, and to conduce to the proof of other facts, the party demurring must admit the facts of which the evidence is so loose, indeterminate and circumstantial, before the court can compel the other side to join *therein. And if there should be such [*323 a joinder without such admission, leaving the facts unsettled and indeterminate, it is a sufficient reason for refusing judgment upon the demurrer; and the judgment, if any is rendered, is liable to be reversed for error. Indeed, the case made for a demurrer to evidence, is, in many respects, like a special verdict. It is to state facts, and not merely testimony which may conduce to prove them. It is to admit whatever the jury may reasonably infer from the evidence, and not merely the circumstances which form a ground of presumption. The principal difference between them is, that, upon a demurrer to evidence, a court may infer, in favor of the party joining in demurrer, every fact of which the evidence might justify an inference; whereas, upon a special verdict, nothing is intended beyond the facts found.

Upon examination of the case at bar, it will be at once perceived that the demurrer to evidence, tried by the principles already stated, is fatally defective. The defendants have demurred, not to facts, but to evidence of facts; not to positive admissions, but to mere circumstances of presumption introduced on the other side. The plaintiff endeavored to prove, by circumstantial evidence, that the defendants granted a license to Marsteller as an auctioneer. The defendants not only did not admit the existence of such a license, but they introduced testimony to disprove the fact. Even if the demurrer could be considered as being exclusively taken to the *plaintiff's evidence, [*324 cisory oath may be tendered to the debtor in a manner somewhat similar to a bill of discovery, as suggested by Mr. Evans. Pothier, Des Oblig. No. 660, 684; Code Civ. Nap. art. 2275. That admirable system of jurisprudence which forms the basis of the municipal law of all Europe (except England) is strongly imbued with the principles on which the rules for the prescription or limitation of actions are founded. Many of the eminent judges who have successively adorned the equity tribunals of England have expressed their strong sense of the provident wisdom of these principles, derived from a deep knowledge of human nature, and adopted from a due regard to the peace and order of society. See Cas. temp. King, 156; 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 269; 1 Ball & Beatt. 156; 2 Jac. & Walk. 140. And for the doctrines of this court as to the application of the analogy of the statute of limitations of possessory action, etc. in equity, see Elmendorf v. Taylor, ante, Vol. X., p. 152, 168, and note a; Ib. p. 177; Prevost v. Gratz, ante, Vol. VI. p. 504; Thomas v. Harvie's Heirs, ante Vol. X. p. 146; Hughes v. Edwards, Vol. IX. p. 489, 497. And, as to the presumption of grants from the lapse of time, see Ricard v. Williams, ante, Vol. VII. p. 59, 109.

The judges in this country have recently shown a strong disposition to break through the chain of authorities by which a mere acknowledgment of the existence of a debt has been permitted to take the case out of the statute of limitations of personal actions. See the very able judgment of Mr. Justice Spencer in Sands v. Gelston, 15 Johns. Rep. 511, in which a powerful effort is made to rescue the statute from a series of misrepresenta-319*] tions which has *nearly destroyed its efficacy. See, also, Roosevelt v. Mark, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 266, 290, where the authority of Sands v. Gelston is recognized by Mr. Chancellor Kent, and the principle is asserted, that an acknowledgment, to take a case out of the statute of limitations, must be of a present, subsisting debt; and, if the acknowledgment be qualified so as to repel the presumption of a promise to pay, it is not evidence of a promise to pay.

In the case referred to in the text, of Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch's Rep. 72, this court stated that it had "been frequently decided that an acknowledgment of a debt barred by the statute of limitations takes the case out of the statute, and revives the original cause of action. So far as decisions have gone on this point, principles may be considered as settled, and the courts will not lightly unsettle them. But they have gone full as far as they ought to be carried, and this court is not inclined to extend them. The statute of limitations is entitled to the same respect with other statutes, and ought not to be explained away." The court proceed to observe that, in the case then in judgment, there was "no promise, conditional or unconditional; but a simple acknowledgment." This acknowledgment goes to the original justice of the account; but this is not enough. The statute of limitations was not enacted to protect persons from claims fictitious in their origin, but from ancient claims, whether well or ill founded, which may have been discharged, but the evidence of discharge may be lost. It is not, then, sufficient to take the case out of the act, that the claim should be proved, or be acknowledged to have been originally just; the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due. In the case at bar the acknowledgment of J. Clarke is, that he had not discharged the account presented to him, but he does not say that it was not discharged. His partner may have paid it without the knowledge of Clarke; and, consequently, the declaration of Clarke that he had not himself paid it, and that he did not know whether his partner had paid it or not, is no proof that the debt remains due, and therefore is not such an acknowledgment as will take the case out of the statute of limitations."

it ought not to have been allowed without a distinct admission of the facts which that evidence conduced to prove. But when the demurrer was so framed as to let in the defendant's evidence, and thus to rebut what the other side aimed to establish, and to overthrow the presumptions arising therefrom, by counter presumptions, it was the duty of the Circuit Court to overrule the demurrer, as incorrect, and untenable in principle. The question referred by it to the court was not a question of law, but of fact.

This being, then, the posture of the case, the next consideration is, what is the proper duty of this court, sitting in error. It is, undoubtedly, to reverse the judgment, and award a venire facias de novo. We may say, as was said by the judges in Gibson v. Hunter, that this demurrer has been so incautiously framed that there is no manner of certainty in the state of facts upon which any judgment can be founded. Under such a predicament, the settled practice is, to award a new trial, upon the ground that the issue between the parties, in effect, has not been tried.

PILES et al., Plaintiffs in Error, v. BOULDIN et al., Defendants in Error.

Under the statute of limitations of Tennessee of 1797, c. 43, s. 4, peaceable and uninterrupted possession, claiming to hold the land adverse to the claims of all other persons, for seven years, under a grant, or deed of conveyance founded upon a grant, gives a complete title to the person who has the possession.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Isaacs for the plaintiffs in error, no counsel appearing for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Duvall delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is brought up by writ of error from the judgment of the Circuit Court for the district of West Tennessee.

The lessee of Bouldin and others, who were plaintiffs in the court below, brought an ejectment against Conrad Piles and others, for a tract of land containing 2,500 acres, lying in Overton county, on Wolf River, granted by the state of North Carolina, by patent dated July 10, 1788, to Thomas and Robert King, who, by deed bearing date 25th of March, 1793, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the same to David Ross, of Virginia. Ross, by 326*] his last will and testament, *duly proved and recorded, devised the same to his four children, namely, Eliza Myers, wife of Jacob Myers, Amanda A. Duffield, wife of John Duffield, Frederick A. Ross, and David Ross, Jun., the lessors of the plaintiff, as tenants in common in fee.

The defendant, Piles, rested his defense on the location of several grants which were offered in evidence on the trial: (1) A grant dated 24th of December, 1798, founded on a warrant dated 10th of March, 1780, by the state of North Carolina, to Henry Rowan, for a tract containing 320 acres, called Walnut Grove, lying in Hawkins county, on Spring Creek. (2) A grant bearing the same date, and founded on the same warrant, by the state of North Carolina to Henry Rowan, for another tract containing 320 acres, adjoining Walnut Grove, and having the same beginning. This tract was conveyed by deed dated 22d of September, 1800, for a valuable consideration, to Conrad Piles, and is described to include a cabin known by the name of Livingston's cabin. (3) A grant bearing date on the 15th of August, 1808, to Conrad Piles, by the state of Tennessee, for a tract lying in Overton county, on Rotton's fork of Wolf River, containing 200 acres; and, (4) Another tract adjoining the former, containing the like quantity, granted by patent of the same date to Conrad Piles. Piles possessed both the tracts granted to Rowan; one by purchase, the other by a parol lease for years. All these tracts located on the plat exhibited on the trial, and none of the locations were contested. The title *of [*327 the plaintiffs is admitted to be regularly deduced from the first patentee.

The defendants read in evidence the two grants before mentioned from the state of North Carolina to Henry Rowan, for 320 acres each; the first is described as lying in Hawkins county, "beginning on two hickories, an ash, and a Spanish oak, on the north side of Spring Creek; running north 50 poles to a stake; west 335 poles to a stake; south 167 poles to a stake, crossing Spring Creek; east 335 poles to a stake; and thence to the beginning." The second tract has the same beginning, calls "to adjoin the first, running east 335 poles to a stake; north 167 poles to a stake; west 335 poles to a stake; then to the beginning." Also, two grants from the state of Tennessee to himself for 200 acres each, dated 15th of August, 1808. These grants interfere with the plaintiff's grant of 2,500 acres, and cover all the land of which the defendant was in possession within the bounds of the plaintiff's grant at the commencement of the suit, viz., the 17th of October, 1817. Nearly one-half of Rowan's tract, called Walnut Grove, is included within the tract for which the ejectment is brought; the settlement called Livingston's cabin lies principally in that part of Walnut Grove thus running foul of the tract owned by the lessors of the plaintiff. Helm's improvement is contained partly in Walnut Grove, and within one of the tracts of 200 acres granted to Piles, which is included almost wholly in the tract of the lessors of the plaintiff, and includes both Livingston's cabin and Helm's *settle- [*328 ment. Piles has made another settlement included in the tract called Walnut Grove, a part of which is contained within the lines of the tract for which the ejectment is brought.

The defendant, Piles, proved that the grants before mentioned, to Rowan and to himself, covered all the lands of which he was possessed within the grant of the plaintiffs; he also proved that the grant of Walnut Grove to Rowan included Livingston's cabin as represented on the plat, and that he had been in the peaceable possession thereof for more than eight years before the commencement of this suit; and that he had also been in possession of a piece of ground within one of the grants to himself, and which is also within the plaintiff's grant, and which he had held and cultivated more than eight years before the commencement of this suit; and relied on the statute of limitations. It was also proved that Rowan, in 1806, had made a parol lease of the tract called Walnut Grove, to one Helm, for six years, in consideration of certain improvements; that Helm took possession, built a cabin, and cleared a few acres of land; that, in the fall of 1807, Piles bought his lease, and agreed to make the further improvements stipulated, and return the possession to Rowan; that he took possession immediately, and continued in possession, claiming for himself, and not as tenant for Rowan, though he did not mention his claim until after he had bought Helm's lease.

Under these circumstances, the defendant, Piles, by his counsel, moved the court to in-329*] struct *the jury that if the deed from Rowan to Piles contained, in its first part, a sufficiently certain description, according to the evidence, of the land included in Rowan's first grant, that then they should disregard any subsequent description therein which should be repugnant to said first description. And, also to charge the jury that if the deed from Rowan to the defendant did not cover said land, yet, that if they believed the defendant went into possession of the land contained in the said first grant to Rowan, under the lease from Rowan to Helm, as stated in the evidence, the defendant could defend himself in this action of ejectment, as tenant of Rowan, without making his landlord a defendant; that, as between Rowan and the defendant, he, the defendant, could not change the nature of his possession, but that the same would operate for Rowan's benefit to perfect his title under the statute of limitations as against the plaintiff and persons claiming under adversary grants; and that, if the defendant's possession had perfected Rowan's title, and made it a better title than the plaintiff's, then, the defendant having shown a better outstanding title, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Which instructions the court refused to give, but instructed the jury that Piles could not avail himself of the statute, and that his *deed from Rowan, by legal construction, did not cover the land included in Rowan's first grant. From this opinion of the court an exception was taken, and the cause is now before this court for revision.

330*] *The counsel for the plaintiffs in error insists that the Circuit Court erred on both points.

The two grants to Rowan begin at the same place, have the same form and dimensions, and contain the same quantity of land. The deed from Rowan to Piles adopts the courses and distances of the second grant precisely, and proceeds to describe it as including the cabin commonly called Livingston's cabin; but Livingston's cabin is included in the first grant called Walnut Grove. The counsel for the plaintiffs in error contend that if the first grant is not conveyed by the deed, it is, at least, doubtful which of the two tracts was intended to be conveyed; and that, therefore, it was a question of location to be settled by the jury, not a question of law to be decided by the court. But this court is of a different opinion. Admitting the universality of the maxim, de jure respondent judices, de facto juratores, it will not be denied that it is the province of the court to decide upon the force and legal effect of a sealed instrument. The deed conveys, by metes and bounds, the land contained in the second grant to Rowan, corresponding precisely, in courses and distances, from the beginning to the given line inclusive; and will not admit of the construction that the first tract, called Walnut Grove, was conveyed, merely because it includes Livingston's cabin. The description in the deed was full and complete without reference to Livingston's cabin, the mention of which appears evidently to be a mistake from inattention in the writer of the deed, and *conveyed [*331 no right or interest whatever in the first grant. And it is conclusive, in the construction of this deed, that it could not have been the intention of either party that the tract called Walnut Grove was intended to be conveyed, that it calls to begin "on the corner of the Walnut Grove tract." There is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court in refusing to instruct the jury according to the first prayer of the counsel for the defendant.

The second question arises upon the plea of the statute of limitations.

By the 4th section of the act of the state of Tennessee, passed in the year 1797, ch. 43, peaceable possession, for seven years, by any person, under a grant or deed of conveyance founded upon a grant, gives a complete title to the person who has the possession; and all persons who neglect, for that period, to prosecute their claims, are declared to be forever barred. There is the usual saving to infants, etc. In this case, the record affords abundant proof, which is uncontradicted, that Piles had peaceable and uninterrupted possession of all the settlements made by him, comprehended within the lines of the plaintiff's grant, and claimed to hold the same as his own, adverse to the claims of all persons whatever. The settlement called Livingston's cabin, and that made by Helm, and transferred by Helm to Piles, are included in his own grant for two hundred acres, dated August 15, 1808, and also within the plaintiff's grant, and principally within that part of Rowan's first *grant which interferes [*332 with that of the plaintiffs. His third possession is contained within Rowan's first grant, which interferes with the plaintiff's grant, as has already been stated. All these possessions, being founded on grants, are protected by the act of limitations, the provisions of which are too plain to be misunderstood.

On this point, the opinion of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.[1]

[Alien. Local Law.]

DOE ex dem. GOVERNEUR'S HEIRS, v. ROBERTSON et al.

An alien may take real property, by grant, whether from the state or a private citizen, and may hold the same until his title is devested by an inquest of office, or some equivalent proceeding.

The act of assembly of Virginia of 1779, c. 13, s. 3, secured from escheat all the interest acquired by aliens in real property, previous to the issuing of the patent, and left the rights acquired by them under the patent to be determined to the general principles of the common law.

The title of an alien thus acquired by patent in 1784, under the laws of Virginia, and subsequently confirmed to him by a legislative act of Kentucky in 1796, and to his heirs, and their grantees, by an act in the same state in 1799, will overreach a grant made by Virginia, to a citizen in 1785, and defeat the claim of all persons holding under such grant.

These legislative acts were valid, under the compact of 1789, between the states of Virginia and Kentucky.

333*] *THIS was an action of ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of Kentucky, in which the lessors of the plaintiff gave in evidence a patent from the comonwealth of Virginia, for the lands in controversy, lying in Kentucky, to Robertus S. Brantz, then an alien, bearing date the 11th of October, 1784, founded on a land-office treasury warrant. They also gave in evidence a certificate of naturalization of the said Brantz, in the state of Maryland, on the 8th of November, 1784, and an act of the legislature of Kentucky, passed in 1796, entitled. "An act for the relief of Robertus Samuel Brantz," which recited that he was an alien when the patent issued; confirmed his estate as fully as if he had been a citizen at the time of the grant, with a proviso, that nothing in the act should affect the right or title of any other person or persons, but only "the right which this commonwealth may have in the said lands." The said Robertus S. Brantz died in 1797, leaving a son, Johannes Brantz, an alien, incapable of inheriting the lands. An act of the legislature of Kentucky, passed December 9th, 1799, reciting that Robertus S. Brantz had departed this life indebted to Isaac and Nicholas Governeur; that Johannes Brantz, his son and executor, and an alien, made a power of attorney to the said N. Governeur to sell the lands of the said R. S. Brantz, for the payment of the debt, which sale had been made; therefore "all the right which the said R. S. Brantz, had, before, and at his death," and the right of the said Johannes Brantz was declared to be vested in *the said I. and N. Governeur, [*334 "as fully as if the said Robertus S. Brantz had done in his life-time, or as if the said Johannes Brantz had been a naturalized citizen when he executed the power of attorney for the sale and conveyance of the said lands."

The defendants claimed title under a grant of the commonwealth of Virginia, dated the 2d of December, 1785, to one Duncan Rose, and proved a regular derivation of title from him.

The plaintiffs thereupon moved the court to instruct the jury that if they found that the grants to R. S. Brantz covered the lands in controversy, that the lessors of the plaintiff duly derive title under N. and I. Governeur, and that R. S. Brantz neither conveyed nor devised those lands, and left no heirs capable of inheriting them, and that the defendants were in possession at the commencement of this suit, that the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

The defendants moved the following instructions:

1. That if the jury find, from the evidence, that Robertus S. Brantz was an alien at the time when the patent given in evidence was procured by him, that nothing passed to him by said grant, but that it was void.

2. That if Robertus S. Brantz died, leaving his son an alien, and having no relations who were citizens of the United States, or of any of the States, then, upon his death without heirs, the title, if it had passed out of the commonwealth by the patent, was immediately vested in the commonwealth; and if the grant to Duncan

The settled doctrine of this country is, that persons born here, but who left the country before the declaration of independence and never returned here, became an alien, and incapable of taking land

335*] *Rose, from the commonwealth of Virginia, includes the land in controversy, then the act of Kentucky, granting the land to N. and I. Governeur, cannot, under the articles of the compact between Virginia and Kentucky, overreach the grant to Duncan Rose from the commonwealth of Virginia; and they ought to find for the defendants.

3. That the plaintiff, showing no title or connection with Robertus S. Brantz, but through and by virtue of the act of Kentucky, given in evidence by plaintiff, such grant from Kentucky is, by virtue of the 3d and 5th articles of the compact with Virginia, of inferior dignity, and inoperative to overreach the grant by the state of Virginia to Duncan Rose.

4. That the acts of Kentucky of 1796 and 1799, given in evidence by the plaintiff, being in pari materia, are to be taken together; that the latter act is explained by the former and by operation of said two acts, and of the said compact between Virginia and Kentucky, the title of the plaintiff, as offered in evidence by him, is younger in date, and inferior in dignity, and cannot overreach the grant to Duncan Rose, so far as those grants conflict.

5. That if they find that the grant to Duncan Rose, given in evidence, includes the land held thereunder by the defendants, then the grant of the commonwealth of Kentucky, in the act given in evidence by the plaintiff, is the junior and inferior claim of title, and the jury ought to find for the defendants.

336*] *The judges of the Circuit Court being divided in opinion upon the instructions moved, the division was certified to this court.

The counsel for the plaintiff made the following points:

1. That Robertus S. Brantz, both at common law, and by the special provisions of the act of Virginia of 1779, c. 13, s. 3, upon his naturalization, took and held an indefeasible title to the lands in question, under his grant.

2. That, consequently, the junior grant to Duncan Rose was void, and conferred no title; and, of course, could not have estopped Virginia if no separation had taken place; and, therefore, could not estop Kentucky, by the articles of compact between the two states, from vesting the title to those lands, by the legislative act of 1799, in I. and N. Governeur.

The defendants, counsel insisted,

1. That R. S. Brantz being an alien when the grant of Virginia issued to him, the title did not pass out of the commonwealth; therefore, the grant to Duncan Rose must be considered as the prior legal title.

2. That under the compact of 1789, between Virginia and Kentucky, the legislative acts of Kentucky of 1796 and 1799, under which the plaintiff claims, cannot overreach the prior grant from Virginia to Rose.

Mr. Sampson, for the plaintiff, argued (1) that *it had been conclusively settled [*337 by an uniform series of decisions in this court, that an alien can take, and hold, real property, either by grant or devise, until office found.[1] The grantee of the state takes by purchase as much as a private grantee.[2] In Craig v. Radford[3] the alienage of a grantee from the state was presented distinctly as a positive bar to his taking, but the court determined the grant to be good, and the decision of that point was inevitably involved in the determination of the cause. And there was no reason, either of policy or law, for making a distinction between a public and a private grant. The title of the government being devested by the grant, which is matter of record, it could not be revested again but by an inquest of office, by which alone the fact of alienage can be determined. Every person resident in the country is presumed to be a citizen until the con-

A court of equity will treat the devise of an alien as valid against heirs-at-law until the title of the alien has been impeached by proceedings on the part of the state. At common law an alien can take lands by purchase, that is by grant or devise, though not by descent; although the estate vests in the alien, not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of the state. If the state sees fit to seize the lands, the same rule must prevail in equity, for it is a general principal of equity that equitable estates are subject to the same modes and conditions as corresponding legal estates. grant was absolutely void, although the fact of the patent previously issued for the same land does not appear on the face of his grant, but is to be proved by other evidence. But, when the authorities speak of a grant as void, all that is meant is, that it shall be held inoperative and of no legal effect, whenever the facts which invalidate it shall appear. Whenever, by the pleadings between other parties, the facts show the King's title, judgment shall be given for him, although he is not a party.[1] A great variety of cases might be mentioned where a resort to evidence in pais would be necessary to determine the validity of the grant. That the grant to Rose was not void, in the sense supposed, but that it was evidence of a contract [*347] between Virginia and the grantee; *that it passed a vested interest capable of being transmitted from one to another by deed or will; that such interests of the junior patentee are treated as legal and not mere equitable interests, and still less as nonentities, a number of cases from the local decisions were cited.[2]

As to the case of Elmendorf v. Carmichael,[3] which had been cited as determining the questions in this cause, it could have no weight as authority in this court, because it did not decide the point as to the construction of the compact of 1789; a subject peculiarly of federal jurisdiction, which was involved in several other cases, all of which would be brought before this court for revision. The opinions, therefore, of the state judges, in that case, could be entitled to no more respect than the judgments of any tribunal, state or national, which this court might be called on to revise on error.

The case of Craig v. Radford,[4] had been cited as determining the question that an alien can take by direct grant from the government. But, it would be found, upon examination, that Sutherland, under whom the respondent claimed in that case, was entitled to a bounty in land under the proclamation of 1783, for military services during the preceding war, and that he obtained his warrant and survey in 1774, at which time he was not an alien. He [*348] did not obtain a *patent until 1788, and it is not, therefore, of this that the court speak, when they say that he took the estate "during the war," and was not devested by any act of Virginia before the treaty of 1794, by which his title was confirmed. But the court meant to refer to the act of Virginia of 1779 (passed during the war), by which the legislature declared that the surveys under the proclamation of 1763 were valid. All the other cases cited to show that an alien can take by grant, and hold, until office found, are cases of grants, or devises, from private individuals to an alien. The distinction between such conveyances and grants from the crown is to be found in all the authorities, from the year books down to the latest elementary writers.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes up from the Circuit Court of Kentucky, upon a difference of opinion certified from that court.

The case was this: Robertus S. Brantz, through whom the plaintiffs make title, obtained, on the 11th of October, 1784, two grants from the commonwealth of Virginia, comprising, together, ten thousand acres of land lying in Kentucky.

One Duncan Rose, through whom the defendants make title, obtained a similar grant, of the date of December 2d, 1785, covering a part of the same land.

Robertus Brantz, at the date of his patent, *was an alien, but became natural- [*349] ized in Maryland on the 8th of November, 1784, less than one month after the date of his patent, and near a year before that of the defendant was obtained.

Some doubts appear to have been raised on the validity of Brantz's patent at an early period, and, in the year 1796, the legislature of Kentucky passed an act, reciting that Brantz was an alien when the patent issued, and affirming his estate as against the rights of the commonwealth, leaving it to operate as to all other persons as if that act had not passed.

Brantz died in 1797, leaving a son, Johannes Brantz, an alien, incapable of inheriting, and owing debts to a considerable amount to the Governeurs. The son, unaware of his disability, executed a letter of attorney, under which the land was sold, and the purchasers, the Governeurs, subsequently discovering this defect, obtained another act from that state affirming their estate.

And this makes out the plaintiff's title.

The defendants' title is regularly deduced through the patent to Duncan Rose.

The record presents, first a general instruction prayed for in behalf of the plaintiffs on their right to recover. And of this there can be no question independently of the points made in the instructions moved for by the defendant, having regard to the effects, (1st) of his alien character; (2d) that of his son; and (3d) of the compact between Virginia and Kentucky on the rights of the parties.

*These will be considered in their [*350] own language, and in their order. The first is,

"That if the jury find that R. S. Brantz was an alien at the time when the patents given in evidence were procured by him, nothing passed to him by the said patent, but that it was void."

Although this, as well as the subsequent prayers of the defendant, purport to present distinct propositions, it will be unavoidable that they should be considered in connection with each other, and with reference to the general prayer of the plaintiff for a charge in his favor The defendant's object in propounding them is to repel the prayer of the plaintiff, and to obtain a charge that the jury should find in his favor. They are introduced, in fact, as grounds upon which the prayer of the plaintiff should be rejected.

And, in this view of the subject, the proposition stated draws after it the consideration of another, to wit: Whether, although the patent to Brantz should be pronounced void, in consideration of his incapacity to take at the time of its emanation, his subsequent naturalization did not relate back so as to obviate every consequence of this alien disability.

On this subject of relation, the authorities are so ancient, so uniform and universal, that nothing can raise a doubt that it has a material bearing on the cause, but the question whether naturalization in Maryland was equivalent to naturalization in Kentucky. To this the articles of confederation furnish an affirmative an- [*351
351*] swer, and the *defendant has not made it a question. Nor, indeed, has he made a question on the subject of relation back; yet it is not easy to see how he could claim the benefit of an affirmative answer on the question he has raised, without first extricating his cause from the effects of the subsequent naturalization, upon the right derived to Brantz through his patent.

The question argued, and intended to be exclusively presented here, is, whether a patent for land to an alien be not an absolute nullity.

The argument is, that it was so at common law, and that the Virginia land laws, in some of their provisions, affirm the common law on this subject.

We think the doctrine of the defendant is not to be sustained on either ground.

It is true, Sir William Blackstone has expressed himself on this subject with less than his usual precision and circumspection; but, whether the context be considered, or his authorities examined, we shall find that this doctrine cannot be maintained. The passage relied on is found in his second volume (p. 347, 348, of Christian), in these words: "If the King grants lands to an alien, it operates nothing." But it would be doing injustice to the writer not to weigh his meaning by the words preceding and following this sentence. His language is this: "But the King's grant shall not enure to any other intent than that which is precisely expressed in the grant. As, if he grants lands to an alien, it operates nothing; [352 352] for such grant shall not also *enure to make him a denizen, that so he may be capable of taking by grant." And the authority referred to is Brooke's Abr. Patent, 62, and Finch's Law, 110. It ought to be 111.

If we could admit that this learned writer could have committed so egregious a blunder as to suppose that an alien must be made denizen before he could take by grant, as a general proposition, he might stand charged with having greatly transcended his authorities. But when it is considered that the effect of an alien's being made denizen is not to enable him to take lands, but to enable him to hold them against the King, we at once see that his language is to be limited to the proposition laid down in the previous sentence, to wit, that the King's grants shall not enure to the double intent, when made to an alien of vesting in him the thing granted, and then, by implication, constituting him a denizen, so as to enable him to hold an indefeasible estate.

In the case referred to as abridged by Brooke, the latter proposition alone is laid down; and the case in the year books, which the author cites, affirms nothing more. This was Bagot's case (7 Edw. IV., p. 29), which appears to have occasioned a vast deal of discussion for several terms in the British courts, and in which Bagot, and another grantee of an office by the crown, brought assize, and the defendant pleaded, as to Bagot, alien nee. In that cause there was no office found, and the question on this part of the case distinctly was, whether the grant did not both vest the right to the office, and create a capacity *to maintain assize to recov- [*353 er it. So, in a case in 4 Leon. 82, the same question was raised, where there had been an inquest of office; and in both the decision distinctly was, that the King's grant did not enure to an intent not expressed distinctly as its object; or, in other words, to a double intent, one direct, the other incidental. In the latter case the alien's right had been affirmed by a patent from the Queen, and the point argued was, that the right of the party was protected by the act of the Queen against the effect of the office found. But, in both these cases the decision was no more than this, that the act of the crown did not incidentally make the party a denizen; and while an alien, he could not be enabled, by any act of the crown, to exercise rights which appertained only to denizens, or to persons naturalized, or natural born subjects.

The other authority to which Blackstone refers, to wit, Finch, imports no more than that an alien shall not maintain an action real or mixed, but has no direct bearing upon the doctrine for which it seems to have been cited by the author.

The words in the passage in Blackstone, more immediately relied on by the defendant, to wit, "If he grants to an alien, it operates nothing," are obviously taken from another passage in Brooke's Abr. Patent, 44, which article gives those words as a dictum of Keble, one of the judges. And by referring to the authority in *the year book on which the author re- [*354 lies, to wit, 2 Hen. VII., 13, the dictum is there found attributed to Keble. But, in that case, as in Bagot's case, there is nothing more argued than that the King's grant shall not enure to the double purpose. And the observation of Keble is only made by way of illustration, accompanied by several others of a similar character, such as that a grant of land to a felon shall not operate as a pardon; or a grant to a company not corporate carry with it a grant of incorporation.

It is clear, therefore, that this doctrine has no sufficient sanction in authority; and it will be found equally unsupported by principle or analogy.

The general rule is positively against it, for the books, old and new, uniformly represent the King as a competent grantor in all cases in which an individual may grant, and any person in esse, and not civiliter mortuus, as a competent grantee. Femes covert, infants, aliens, persons attainted of treason or felony, clerks, convicts, and many others, are expressly enumerated as competent grantees. Perkin's Grant, 47, 48, 51, etc.; Comyn's Dig. Grant, B, 1. It behooves those, therefore, who would accept aliens, when the immediate object of the Kings' grant, to maintain the exception.

It is argued that there is an analogy between this case and that of the heir, or the widow, or the husband, alien; no one of whom can take, but the King shall enter upon them without office found. Whereas, an alien may take by 355*] purchase, *and hold until devested by office found. It is argued that the reason usually assigned for this distinction, to wit, "Nil frustra agit lex," may, with the same correctness, be applied to the case of a grant by the King to an alien, as to one taking by descent, dower or curtesy. That the alien only takes from the King to return the subject of the grant back again to the King by escheat. But this reasoning obviously assumes as law the very principle it is introduced to support; since, unless the grant be void, it cannot be predicated of it that it was executed in vain. It is also inconsistent with a known and familiar principle in law, and one lying at the very root of the distinction between taking by purchase and taking by descent. It implies, in fact, a repugnancy in language; since the very reason of the distinction between aliens taking by purchase, and by descent is, that one takes by deed, the other by act of law; whereas a grantee ex vi termini, takes by deed and not by act of law. If there is any view of the subject in which an alien, taking under grant, may be considered as taking by operation of law, it is because the grant issues, and takes effect, under a law of the state. But this is by no means the sense of the rule, since attaching to it this idea would be to declare the legislative power of the state incompetent to vest in an alien even a defeasible estate.

That an alien can take by deed, and can hold until office found, must now be regarded as a positive rule of law, so well established 356*] that the *reason of the rule is little more than a subject for the antiquary. It no doubt owes its present authority, if not its origin, to a regard to the peace of society, and a desire to protect the individual from arbitrary aggression. Hence it is usually said that it has regard to the solemnity of the livery of seisin, which ought not to be devested without some corresponding solemnity. But there is one reason assigned by a very judicious compiler, which, from its good sense and applicability to the nature of our government, makes it proper to introduce it here. I copy it from Bacon, not having had leisure to examine the authority which he cites for it. "Every person," says he, "is supposed a natural born subject, that is resident in the kingdom, and that owes a local allegiance to the King, till the contrary be found by office." This reason. it will be perceived, applies with double force to the resident who has acquired of the sovereign himself, whether by purchase or by favor, a grant of freehold.

It remains to examine the effect of the Virginia laws upon grants made to aliens. Those laws provide that aliens may purchase warrants for land, and pass them through all the stages necessary to obtain a patent, and may exercise every power over the inchoate interest thus acquired, in the same manner with citizens: and after returning the plat and survey to the register's office, shall be allowed eighteen months to become a citizen, or transfer their interests to those who are citizens.

But we think the inference by no means unavoidable; and, in addition to the general and strong objections to raising an enactment by inference, consider it as unsupported either by the policy or the provision of the act.

It is well known that the purchaser of a warrant, under the laws of Virginia, acquired a beneficial interest in the soil, that the survey located that interest upon a particular portion of soil by metes and bounds, and the interest thus acquired was devisable, assignable, descendible, and wanted, in fact, nothing but a mere formality to give it all the attributes of a freehold. Hence a doubt arose, not whether an alien could acquire an interest under a warrant and survey, but whether that interest might not be subject to escheat. The object of the law was to encourage aliens to purchase, and to settle the country; and all its provisions on this subject were intended to enlarge his rights, not to restrict them. Aliens arriving in the country could not immediately be naturalized, but they might immediately enter upon those arrangements for establishing themselves when naturalized, which were necessary to precede a grant. Hence the only true construction of the Virginia law is, that as to all the interest acquired in land previous to grant, it was intended to enlarge their rights, and secure them from escheat; while, as to the rights which they might acquire by patent, they were to be left under the ordinary *alien disabilities, whatever those were, [*358 which the law imposed.

The Virginia act, therefore, has no influence upon the rights of the parties in this cause.

The object of the next four prayers for instruction in behalf of the defendant is, to maintain the proposition that the act of Kentucky of 1799, which confirmed the interest of the purchasers under the letter of attorney of the son of Brantz, was in derogation of the rights of Duncan Rose, the subsequent grantee.

The argument is, that on the decease of the father, without an heir that could take, the land in controversy reverted to the state, and the junior patent then fastened upon it in the ordinary manner in which it attaches to the soil when a prior grant is removed from before it. That the act of 1799 was nothing more than a junior grant for the same land, and a grant which the state was estopped from making to the prejudice of the prior patentee, as well upon general principles, as under the provisions of the compact between the two states.

It is obvious, that in considering this argument, the court cannot place the defendant on more favorable ground than by substituting Virginia for Kentucky, and allowing him all the rights that he might have set up against the former state. And it is equally obvious, that to admit of the right set up in favor of the junior patent's attaching as a patent upon the escheat, it must be affirmed that escheated land was liable to be taken up by patent; whereas the act authorizes patent *to [*359 issue upon waste and unappropriated lands exclusively, and not upon eschcated property. And so it has been settled by adjudications both in Kentucky and Virginia. Elmendorf v. Carmichael, 3 Littel. Rep. 484.

It is further obvious, that as to the claim set up by the defendant on the ground of moral right and estoppel, the court will concede much more than he has a right to assume if it allows him the benefit of his argument to the whole extent in which it may be applied to the rights and obligations of individuals. Assuming, argumenti gratia, that the state could not supersede the right of the defendant derived under his patent, in any case in which an individual would be estopped, or might be decreed to convey. But it is only on the ground of fraud or contract that the law acts upon individuals in either of the supposed cases. Fraud is not imputable to a government; but if it were, where is there scope found for the imputation of it in the relation between a state and the patentee of its vacant lands? In selling the warrant, the state enters into contract no further than that the purchaser shall have that quantity of vacant land if he can find it. And when the patent issues, it is to the patentee, if to anyone, that the fraud is imputable if the land be not vacant. The state never intends to grant the lands of another; and where the grantee is ignorant of the previous patent, the maxim, caveat emptor, is emphatically applicable to this species of contract.

But to what result would this doctrine lead 360*] *us? A junior grant is to be vested with the attribute of hanging over a valid and indefeasible appropriation of soil, waiting to vest upon the occurrence of the casualty of an escheat or an indefinite failure of heirs? This may not happen in a hundred years; it may not occur upon one life, as in this case, but may occur after the lapse of one hundred lives. It is impossible that such a claim can be countenanced. Neither principle nor policy sustains it. And, in fact, the decision upon the first ground is fatal to the cause of the defendant upon the last; for, upon no principle but the assumed nullity of the patent to Brantz, could any contract be imputed to the state to make good the junior patent, under which the defendant deduces his title. In that case, the land would still have remained vacant land, and, as such, the junior patent would, of course, have taken effect upon it as a patent, and by the immediate operation of the land law, without reference to the supposed incidental rights here set up.

So far this court has considered the cause as one of a new impression; but, on examining the adjudications quoted, they are satisfied, that in every point material to the plaintiffs, the case has been solemnly adjudicated in the courts of Kentucky.

They will, therefore, direct an opinion to be certified in favor of the plaintiff.

GUY, Defendant in Error.

The terms "beyond seas," in the saving clause of a statute of limitations, are to be construed as equivalent to without the limits of the state where the statute is enacted.

Quære, How far this construction has been adopted by the courts of Tennessee.

Five years bona fide possession of a slave constitutes a title, by the laws of Virginia, upon which the possessor may recover in detinue; and this title may be set up by the vendee of such possessor in the courts of Tennessee, as a defense to a suit brought by a third party in those courts.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Jones for the plaintiffs in error, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. White for the defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Johnson delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs here were defendants in the court below in an action of detinue brought by Thomas Guy, to recover sundry slaves.

The defendants below plead non detinet, and the act of limitations of the state of Tennessee, which bars the action of detinue in three years.

The plaintiff joins issue upon the plea on non detinet, and files a special replication to the plea *of the statute, the object of [*362 which is to bring himself within the saving in favor of absentees. The defendants demurred to this replication, but the demurrer being overruled, the parties went to trial on the general issue, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff in the form now usual in the action of detinue.

To revise the judgment of the court in overruling the demurrer, and its decisions upon various points of law raised in the progress of the trial, this writ of error is brought.

The case was this: One Dickerson, a citizen of Virginia, the father of the plaintiff's mother, was owner of a female slave named Amy, from whom the slave claimed had descended. Upon the marriage of Thomas Terry Guy with the plaintiff's mother, or soon after, and prior to the year 1778, the slave Amy passed into the possession of T. T. Guy, but whether by loan or parol gift, is a point litigated, and upon which some of the principle questions in the cause arise.

From the year 1778 to 1794, the slaves remained in Virginia, in the possession of the plaintiff's father T. T. Guy, when he sold her and her increase to David Shelby, who thereupon removed with the slaves to Tennessee, where he and they have ever since resided.

In the year 1788, Dickerson made his will and died; and the will was proved and recorded in July, 1788. In this will he says: "I lend to my son-in-law T. T. Guy, the negroes which he now has in his possession, that I lent him in the life-time of his wife, during his natural life, viz., *Cuffee, Gilbert, and Amy; [*363 and at his death I give the aforesaid slaves, with their increase, to my grandsons John and Thomas Guy, and their heirs, forever."

Thomas Guy, here named, is the plaintiff in this action; the executory devise to him and John took effect by the death of their father in 1795. John died unmarried, under age, and intestate, after his father, but before the action brought, and neither of the brothers had been in the state of Tennessee until within three years prior to the institution of the suit, but had resided in the state of Virginia.

These are the material facts in the cause. The points argued have been very numerous; but if the plaintiff has tripped in pleading, by a vicious replication, the questions on the merits are put out of the case. The points arising on the demurrer, therefore, must first be considered.

The replication demurred to, states, in substance, the right of Dickerson to the negro Amy, and the continuance of that right up to his death; the bequest to the father of the plaintiff for life, and to the plaintiff and John after his death; the death of the father, and of John; the qualifying of the executors on the will, and their assent to the legacy; the sale by the father to Shelby in 1794; Shelby's removal with the slaves of Tennessee, and subsequent residence there, and the residence of John up to his death, and of the plaintiff, to within three years of the bringing of this suit, in the state of Virginia.

364*] *The demurrer filed to this replication is special, and assigns for cause,

1. That it states the evidence of title, and does not allege a fact.

2. That it is double, in relying on the facts both of title and of non-residence.

But, claiming the right of looking back to the first fault, and other benefits appertaining to a general demurrer, to which, no doubt, he is entitled, the counsel for the defendant have raised a variety of other questions in the cause, of more interest than those specified.

As, first, that the counts in the declaration are repugnant, the one being essentially a count in trover, the other in detinue; and,

Second, that the replication involves a departure, inasmuch as the writ claims the whole property, and the replication shows him to be entitled to no more than a moiety.

That the replication is more characterized by prolixity than by science, the court will readily admit; but that it is essentially vicious cannot be maintained.

The general object of the plaintiff is to fortify his title or demand, and this is a legitimate object. Nor can we perceive, that in doing this he has either stated evidence where he ought to allege facts, or tendered to the defendant a double answer to his plea, or, rather, "distinct matters to one and the same thing, whereunto several answers are required." That it is redundant, and abounds in surplusage, with reference to the issue tendered, is obvious; 365*] but it prefers only one *answer that will fit the plea, which is, absence from the state of Tennessee during the term when the statute would bar him.

Yet, as he has thought proper to amplify upon the nature of his demand, if he had prostrated his own action, the law would visit him with the consequences.

The argument on this point is, that having set out a joint devise to himself and his brother, he is incapable of maintaining alone a suit for the entirety of the thing devised. But in this we are of opinion that the law is with him.

It is true, that tenants in common must ordinarily join in an action, and that the laws of Virginia produce a severance upon the death of a joint tenant, so that the right of survivorship is abolished. But it is also true, that in suits for an indivisible thing, a right of action survives to a tenant in common; and this from the necessity of the case, as we conceive the authorities sufficiently maintain. Co. Litt. 198 a; Bro. Abr. tit. Tenant in Common, pl. 18.

The exceptions to the courts clearly cannot be sustained. They are consubstantial, and the same plea and judgment proper to both. Averring that the defendant came to the possession of the chattel by finding, does not constitute a count in trover; an alleged conversion characterizes that form of action. Nor is it any objection to the counts that one of them states a right to recovery founded in a possession merely, without the direct allegation of property, since a tortious detention may well be of that which another has *no interest in, but [*366 to the temporary use or custody. Co. Litt. 286; Roll. Abr. 575. Thus, a bailee, or common carrier, or sheriff, may maintain this action, and expressly against one who has them by delivery or finding. 2 Saund 47; Cro. Jac. 73, et passim. We come, then, to the question raised by the demurrer upon the statute of limitations of Tennessee; and here we are met by one of those embarrassments which necessarily grow out of our peculiar system.

North Carolina, in common with most of the old states, adopted the language of the statute of James in its act of limitations. This was the law of Tennessee before its separation from that state, and continues so to this day. The persons excepted from its operation, are infants, femes covert, etc., and "persons beyond seas."

During a century nearly that this law has been the local law of that country, we cannot ascertain that the courts of either of those states have been called on to decide whether it shall be construed according to its literal meaning. In the meantime, solemn adjudications have taken place in several of the states, to the purport that persons without the jurisdiction of the country, though not actually beyond seas, are within the equity, if not within the actual meaning of the statutes containing the same words, and borrowed from the same source. And in a case which came up to this court from Georgia, in the year 1818, it was solemnly decided that it was impossible to give a sensible and reasonable *construction to those [*367 words according to their literal signification. But we are now informed, and, as it is admitted by the opposite counsel, we cannot question it, that a contrary adjudication has taken place in the courts of Tennessee within the last year, for the first time. It is obvious, that without a more particular report of that adjudication, this court could not now act finally upon its authority. But if the majority of the court were of opinion that an insulated decision on a point thus circumstanced ought to control the previous decision of this court, the course would undoubtedly be, to hold up this cause for advisement.

That the statute law of the states must furnish the rule of decision to this court, as far as they comport with the constitution of the United States in all cases arising within the respective states, is a position that no one doubts. Nor is it questionable that a fixed and received construction of their respective statute laws in their own courts makes, in fact, a part of the statute law of the country, however we may doubt the propriety of that construction. It is obvious, that this admission may, at times, involve us in seeming inconsistencies; as, where states have adopted the same statutes, and their courts differ in the construction. Yet that course is necessarily indicated by the duty imposed on us, to administer, as between certain individuals, the laws of the respective states according to the best lights we possess of what those laws are. This court has uniformly man-368*] ifested its respect for *the adjudications of the state tribunals, and will be very moderate in those claims which may be preferred on the ground of comity. Yet, in a case like the one now occurring, it cannot acknowledge the objection to go farther, at present, than to examine the decision formerly rendered on the construction of these words.

We have reflected, and heard arguments on our former decision, and not a doubt has been entertained, except on the question how far we were bound to surrender an opinion, under the actual state of difference existing between our construction and that of the state from which this cause comes.

It is true, that the words "beyond seas," considered abstractedly, must, in every state in this Union, mean something more than "without the limits of the commonwealth;" which words the state of Virginia has very properly added to the statute of James. But it is also true, that if the words "beyond seas" be considered with reference to the insular situation of the country from which we adopted the law, they mean exactly the same as the words superadded in the Virginia law. And it was this consideration, as well as the obvious absurdity of applying the terms, "beyond seas," in their literal signification, that induced this court, and has induced so many state courts, to give it the meaning of beyond the commonwealth.

If equity, as applied to the construction of statutes by an eminent writer, means "the correction of that wherein the law, by reason of 369*] *its universality, is deficient;" or, as another defines it, "interpreting statutes by the reason of them," may be applied to any case, we think it may to one which, while it operates in restraint of common right, would, by a literal construction, make no saving in favor of persons residing in the most distant and unfrequented parts of this extensive continent.

Nevertheless, as this cause must go back upon other grounds, we will, for the present, waive a positive decision on this point as applied to the state of Tennessee, trusting that the courts of the state from which this cause comes will, in due time, furnish such lights upon the fixed law of that state on this subject as will enable the courts of the United States to come to a satisfactory conclusion upon the question.

The next class of questions in the cause arise under bills of exception. The object of the defendants, in the several prayers for instructions propounded to the court, was to be let into proof of a title, without will or deed, in the father of T. T. Guy, from whom they purchased, and to maintain, that although that title was only derived to him by implication under the limitation acts of Virginia, it was sufficient, not only to make out a defense by pleading, but by giving such facts in evidence as would be a good defense on a plea of the statute of limitations, if the suit were instituted in the state of Virginia, or to maintain detinue in a suit to recover in right of a possession under the statute in that state. *With this [*370 view, he proposed to rely on the following propositions:

1. That the proof that Dickerson, on the marriage of Guy with his daughter, had sent the slave in question with them, or to them, upon their going to house-keeping, and permitted her to remain there ever after as their property, without any specific declaration of the interest vested in them, other than the will of 1788, with a variety of corroborating facts, was sufficient to sustain an inference of a gift or transfer by parol, and of such an adverse possession as might constitute a bar under the act of limitations of Virginia of 1705.

This the court refused, on the ground that a parol gift of slaves in Virginia was, at the date of that transaction, absolutely void.

In this, it is contended the court erred, both as to the law and as to its application to the case.

As to the law, we are of opinion that the question is not now to be stirred. We do not mean to intimate an opinion on the construction of the acts of 1757 and 1758, on this subject; but only to treat it as a decided point upon the construction of those statutes, that a parol gift of slaves made in Virginia, even where the possession passed, between the years 1757 and 1787, was void, or voidable; for, as to all the purposes of this case, it is immaterial which. The declaratory act of December 31, 1787, we regard as a new enactment, taking effect from its date, as a repeal of the prior acts in those *cases in which the possession [*371 passed with the gift. The possession here relied on was from 1775 to 1788, at which time the will was recorded. And here the material question arises, whether, if void or voidable, it does not create such an adverse interest in the donee, as the statute of 1795 may attach upon, so as to vest a complete interest. And on this point we think the court erred in rejecting the proof. For, although the gift may have been void or voidable, the fact of delivery of possession attended it, and this must have put the party to his action to re-instate himself in the enjoyment of the property. The limitation to the action of detinue in Virginia is five years; and here the supposed donee proves a possession of ten years.

There can, then, be but one doubt raised on the right of the defendant to the instruction here prayed, and to the admission of the evidence offered to the fact of a parol gift, and that is, whether he could avail himself of this defense in this mode.

In the case of Newby v. Blakley, 3 Hen. & Mun., 57, a case strikingly resembling this in its circumstances, it was adjudged that a plaintiff, in Virginia, may recover in detinue upon five years peaceable possession of a slave acquired without force or fraud. And four months after that decision, and obviously without being apprised of it, this court, in the case of Brent v. Chapman, maintained the same doctrine. 5 Cranch's Rep. 358.

It follows, we think, that on the same prin-

372*] ciple, *such a possession must constitute a good defense in Tennessee. To preclude the defendant from availing himself of the benefit of that evidence which would have sustained an action for the same property by the person from whom he purchased it, would be to convert a good and valid title in Virginia into a defeasible title in Tennessee; a sufficient title in a vendor into a defeasible title in his vendee; and, by an indirect operation, to make the seller liable, where a direct action could not have been maintained against him to recover the property sold.

The second prayer is calculated to obtain of the court an instruction that, after an indefinite loan to Guy, the father, a subsequent devise to his children, if intended to save the slaves from his creditors, was inoperative as to Guy, and purchasers for valuable consideration claiming under him, unless with actual notice of the will.

On this, it is sufficient to remark, that as there were no creditors before the court, the court was under no obligation to speculate upon the possible effect of their interests upon the case. And this gets rid of the influence of the decision in Fitzhugh v. Anderson, on the cause, as will be more particularly shown in a subsequent part of this opinion. The defendant here was a purchaser from T. T. Guy at the time when the will of the grandfather was of record. How far purchasers are affected with record notice, is obviously a point of local law. And we understand that much importance is attached to it in the jurisprudence of 373*] Virginia. Certainly, in ordinary *cases, where such a source of information is open to all, those who do not avail themselves of it come with an ill grace before a court to complain of imposition.

The third prayer was intended to maintain that, on the circumstances of the case, the jury might infer both a deed and the recording of that deed. Broad as this claim was, it is obvious that the court was not bound to give the instruction, since it would have availed the party nothing, without the additional fact of the loss or extinction of the record also.

The fourth prayer has relation to the question, whether the right of action survived to the tenant in common, which has been already answered. As Thomas Terry Guy died before his son John, the executory devise to John and the plaintiff became vested in possession. Their right of action then accrued, and that right survived to this plaintiff, whatever may be the ultimate distribution of the slaves when recovered. This also was rightfully refused.

And the same remark answers many of the exceptions taken to the charge which the court below did give upon the sufficiency of the plaintiff's cause of action, and the form of laying it.

Other exceptions are taken to the legal doctrines of that charge; one of which is, that, under the Virginia statute of frauds of 1785, the loan, with five years' possession, became a vested title in T. T. Guy; another, that upon the general doctrines of courts of law, on the subject of frauds imputable where the posses- 374*] sion remains *in one, and the right in another, this will should be adjudged a mere cover and evasion, or a new devise for the perpetration of fraud.

But on these subjects we think it unnecessary to remark at any length; the dates and facts do not bring the case within the operation of the statute of frauds of 1785; and, with regard to the general doctrine, it never has been supposed to extend to a purchaser with notice, much less to a purchaser whom the local law effects with notice of the highest order. Had the defendant, in this instance, been a creditor of T. T. Guy, who had trusted him on the faith of this property, and now sought relief under the principle in Twyne's case, the decision in Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 Hen. & Mun., 289, might have applied. That case was expressly decided upon the principle in Twyne's case. The complainants were legate of their grandfather, under a will that was not recorded until three years after the creditors (who were defendants) had sold the son's slaves under execution; slaves which he had held in possession for fifteen years, under a loan, which was never avowed until the slaves were set up for sale, and which there was obviously much cause for bringing into serious suspicion.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

WALKER et ux., Appellants,

v.

CYRUS GRIFFIN'S HEIRS, Respondents.

Devise of the testator's estate, "One-fourth part to be given to the families of G. Holloway, W. B. Blackbourn, and A. Bartlett, to those of their children that my wife shall think proper, but in a greater proportion to F. P. Holloway, than to any other of G. Holloway's children; to E. P. Bartlett in a greater proportion than any of A. Bartlett's children. The balance to be given to the families of C. and J. T. Griffin's children, in equal proportion." Held, that the children of C. & J. T. Griffin took per stirpes, and not per capita, and that the property devised to them was to be divided into two equal parts, one moiety to be assigned to each family.

THIS cause was submitted without argument.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court:

This case depends entirely on the will of Francis Peart, deceased. The testator had devised his estate to the County Court of Woodford, in trust for purposes therein mentioned; after which he adds, "should the County Court of Woodford not have a right to take into possession this donation of the within will, I do request one-fourth part to be given to the families of G. Holloway, William B. Blackbourn, and A. Bartlett, to those of their children that my wife may think proper, but in a greater proportion to Francis *P. Hollo- [*376 way than any other of G. Holloway's children; to Elizabeth P. Bartlett in a greater proportion than any of A. Bartlett's children. The balance to be given to the families of Cyrus and John T. Griffin's children, in equal proportion."

The devise to the County Court of Woodford was held void; and thereupon the heirs of Cyrus Griffin, who was dead at the time the will was made, brought a friendly suit against the heirs of John T. Griffin, who was also dead, in the Circuit Court for the district of Kentucky, for a division of the property. The Circuit Court decided that the children were entitled to it in exclusion of the grandchildren, whose parents were living, and that all the children should take in equal proportion. From this decree the heirs of John Taylor Griffin have appealed to this court.

It is apparent, that in the devise of one-fourth to the families of G. Holloway, William B. Blackbourn, and A. Bartlett, the testator intended to designate the children in exclusion of the grandchildren, because he adds, "to those of their children that my wife may think proper;" obviously having the children only in his mind, and not taking grandchildren into view. When, in the same paragraph, and in the succeeding sentence, he uses the same word in the devise to the families of Cyrus and John T. Griffin, he must be supposed to have used it in the same sense, unless the additional words, "children to take in equal proportion," should show a change of intention, and that 377*] the property *was given to the children of the families, and not to the families themselves.

The use of the words, "families of Cyrus and John T. Griffin's children," to designate the grandchildren of Cyrus and John T. Griffin, would certainly be an unusual as well as awkward mode of describing them, and we think there is no necessity for resorting to this construction. The introduction of these words is to be readily accounted for. In the preceding devise, the testator had directed the children of two of the families to take unequally. In this he intended them to take equally; and therefore makes that provision.

The more difficult inquiry is, whether the property is to be divided into two equal parts, the one to be assigned to the family of Cyrus, and the other to the family of John T. Griffin; or is to be divided equally among all the children of the two stocks.

In solving this difficulty, it becomes necessary again to resort to the preceding sentence.

The families of G. Holloway, Wm. P. Blackbourn, and A. Bartlett, take, each family, as a single devisee. Whatever may be the number of persons composing the family, and however unequal may be their number, they take, collectively, distinct and equal shares by families; each family constituting an individual devisee. This would be, we think, the natural import of the words, if unexplained by others. But we think this construction is strengthened by the 378*] residue of the *sentence. The testator adds, "to those of their children that my wife may think proper, but in a greater proportion to F. P. Holloway than to any other of G. Holloway's children, to E. P. Bartlett in a greater proportion than to any of A. Bartlett's children."

These words show that the inequalities intended by the testator were between children of the same family, not between the families. Francis P. Holloway was to have more, not than any of those who took under the devise, but than any other of G. Holloway's children. So with respect to Elizabeth P. Bartlett. In each case the share of the family is to be distributed among the children of the family at the discretion of the wife; that discretion being limited so far only that F. P. Holloway should have more than any other of G. Holloway's children, and E. P. Bartlett more than any of A. Bartlett's children.

We think it perfectly clear that the families take in equal proportions.

It is reasonable to suppose that the same intention was preserved with regard to the families of Cyrus and John T. Griffin, and the words must receive the same construction if not controlled by those with which they are connected. Had the devise been to the families of Cyrus and John T. Griffin, the natural and obvious construction would have been that the families took equally. We are, then, to inquire, what is the effect of the additional words, "children in equal proportion." Cyrus Griffin and John T. Griffin were both dead, Cyrus leaving four, and John T. Griffin two children, who were living at *the death of the [*379 testator, and were the objects of this devise. Had he intended them to take equally, the natural mode of expressing that intention would have been to devise the property to the children of Cyrus and John T. Griffin. They would then have taken individually, and not by families; but the testator directs them to take by families. Why, then, are the words, "children in equal proportion," added? The testator had, in the preceding sentence, devised a part of the same property to three families, and had directed that the children of each should take unequally. Proceeding immediately to the two families of the Griffins, it was natural, though not necessary, to express his wish that the children should take equally. But neither in this, nor in the preceding devise, does he mingle the children of the different families in one mass. He speaks of them severally by families. We are therefore of opinion that the children of Cyrus and John T. Griffin take by families, and that the property devised to them is to be divided into two equal parts, one moiety to be assigned to each family.

Decree.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, etc. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the children of Cyrus and John T. Griffin took the property devised to them in the will of Francis Peart, deceased, by families. This court is therefore of opinion that the decree of the *Circuit Court is erroneous, inso- [*380 much as it directs the said property to be divided among the said children per capita, and not per stirpes, and ought to be reversed, and this court doth so far reverse the same, and in all things else it is affirmed. And the cause is remanded to the said Circuit Court, that farther proceedings may be had therein according to law.

[Local Law.]

DOE, EX DEM. PATTERSON, v. WINN ET AL.

In general, the validity of a patent for lands can only be impeached for causes anterior to its being issued, in a court of equity. But where the grant is absolutely void, as where the state has no title, or the officer has no authority to issue the grant, the validity of the grant may be contested at law.

The laws of Georgia, in the year 1787, did not prohibit the issuing of a patent to any one person for more than 1,000 acres of land. The proviso in the act of assembly of the 17th of February, 1783, limiting the quantity to that number, is exclusively confined to head-rights.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Berrien and Mr. Wilde for the plaintiff, and by Mr. White for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up from the Circuit Court 381*] for *the district of Georgia. And the question presented for decision appears by a certificate of division of opinion in that court, as to the admissibility of the grant offered in evidence on the part of the plaintiff.

The certificate states that the plaintiff, to maintain his action, offered in evidence a patent, purporting to be a grant, in due form of law, from the state of Georgia to one Basil Jones, for seven thousand three hundred acres of land, including the premises in question. And also the warrant of survey upon which the said tract of land was laid off and surveyed, and the minutes of the court which granted the warrant. The defendant's counsel objected to the grant's going to the jury, affirming the same to be void in law, inasmuch as no grant could issue under the laws of the state for so great a number of acres as are comprised in the said grant. On which question so made the court was divided in opinion.

The broad ground assumed in the objection is, that the patent was absolutely void, and not even prima facie evidence of title. The question, as stated, does not distinctly present to the court the point that was probably intended to be submitted. The objection alleges the patent to be void, because, by the laws of Georgia, no grant could issue for so great a number of acres as seven thousand three hundred, without stating the limitation as to the number of acres. But, from the argument, it is understood that the limitation contended for on the 382*] part of the defendant, *is to one thousand acres, and that all grants for a greater quantity are absolutely void.

How far it is within the province of a court of law to entertain inquiries tending to impeach a patent, is a question upon which conflicting opinions have been held, particularly in the different state courts in this country. By some, the patent is considered only prima facie evidence of title, and open to extrinsic evidence to impeach its validity. By others, that the defect must appear upon the face of the patent, to authorize a court of law to pronounce it invalid; and that unless the defect does so appear, the patent is only voidable, and recourse must be had to a court of chancery to vacate it. By others it has been considered that the powers of a court of law were not so broad as laid down in the former of these opinions, nor so limited as in the latter, but that a court of law may inquire whether the patent was issued without authority, or against the prohibition of a statute, or whether the state had title to the land granted. It is unnecessary, if not improper, at this time, to enter into an examination which of these opinions is best founded in principle. For, so far as the question applies to the present case, it has been settled by this court in the case of Polk's Lessee v. Wendell et al. 9 Cranch's Rep. 87. In that part of the case to which I refer, the exceptions under consideration were for causes not apparent on the face of the patent; and the proposition stated for decision is, whether in any, and in what cases, it is allowable, in an action of ejectment, to impeach *a grant from the state for [*383 causes anterior to its being issued. It is said that the laws for the sale of public lands provide many guards to secure the regularity of grants, to protect the incipient rights of individuals, and also to protect the state from imposition. Officers are appointed to superintend the business, and rules are framed prescribing their duty. These rules are, in general, directory, and when all the proceedings are completed by a patent, issued by the authority of the state, a compliance with these rules is presupposed. That every prerequisite has been performed, is an inference properly deducible, and which every man has a right to draw, from the existence of the grant itself. It would be extremely unreasonable to avoid a grant in any court for irregularities in the conduct of those who are appointed by the government to supervise the progressive course of a title, from its commencement to its consummation in a patent. But, in order to guard against the conclusion that this doctrine would lead to, closing the door against all inquiry into any matter whatever beyond the grant for the purpose of avoiding it, the court adds, that the great principles of justice and of law would be violated, if there did not exist some tribunal to which an injured party might appeal, and in which the means by which an elder title was acquired might be examined, if it had been acquired by the violation of principles essential to the validity of a contract; but that a court of equity is the more eligible tribunal, in general, for these questions, *and they ought [*384 to be excluded from a court of law. But the court say there are cases in which a grant is absolutely void (or inoperative), as where the state has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant. In such cases, the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law.

This doctrine was again recognized and sanctioned by this court five years afterwards, when the same cause (5 Wheat. Rep. 293) was a second time under consideration; and it is in coincidence with the rule settled in the Supreme Court of New York in the case of Jackson v. Lawton, 10 Johns. Rep. 23. We may therefore assume, as the settled doctrine of this court, that if a patent is absolutely void upon its face, or the issuing thereof was without authority, or was prohibited by statute, or the state had no title, it may be impeached collaterally in a court of law, in an action of ejectment. But, in general, other objections and defects complained of must be put in issue, in a regular course of pleadings, on a direct proceeding to avoid the patent; and we are not aware of any contrary rule prevailing in the state courts of Georgia. But, so far as we have any information on the subject, the practice there is in accordance with the rule laid down by this court.

The objection in this case to the admissibility of the grant in evidence is, that it was issued without the authority of law, and in violation of certain statutes of the state of Georgia, which, it is alleged, prohibit the issuing of a 385*] grant to *any one person for more than one thousand acres of land; and if the statutes referred to will warrant this construction, the objection was well taken, and can be sustained in a court of law. And this leads to an examination of those statutes as applicable to the grant in question.

The grant bears date on the 24th of May, 1787, and is for 7,300 acres of land in the county of Franklin, described by metes and bounds, and referring to a plat of the same thereunto annexed. No consideration is expressed in the grant, or any designation of the nature of the rights which made up the quantity of land mentioned in the grant, but it is in the common form prescribed by statute. The proceedings of the court of Franklin county, on the application of Basil Jones, accompany the grant, by which it is ordered that he have 7,300 acres in lieu of part of old warrants of John Peter Wagnor—bounty reserved. This shows that the aggregate quantity of land mentioned in the grant was made up of sundry old warrants, and affords also an inference of the existence of a practice of consolidating a number of warrants in one grant; and there is nothing in the land laws of Georgia prior to the year 1794 at variance with such a practice. The limitation as to quantity will be found to relate to warrants for head-rights, and not to grants; and, as warrants were transferable, no objection existed to their being united in one grant.

The land law of Georgia is comprised under several statutes, passed at different periods, va- 386*] rying *and modifying the system occasionally, as policy required. But all being in pari materia, are to be looked to as one statute, in explaining their meaning and import. Under these laws, there were various ways in which persons became entitled to rights and could obtain warrants for land; such as head-rights, according to the number of a family; bounties to soldiers and to citizens, and likewise for the encouragement of certain manufactures, etc. And for the purpose of ascertaining and determining whether applicants were entitled to warrants, a land court was instituted in each county, to receive applications for lands, and grant warrants for surveys to such as should show themselves entitled to land, according to the provisions of the land laws. A county surveyor was required to be appointed by each county, who was authorized to lay out and survey, to any person who should apply to him, the land for which a warrant had been obtained. And he was required to record, in an office to be kept for that purpose, all surveys by him made, so as to enable those who had any objections to make to the passing of the grant, to enter a caveat, which was to be tried by a jury of twelve men, sworn to try the matter according to law and equity. And under the act of July 17, 1783 (Prince's Dig. 266, sec. 36), this was declared to be final and conclusive. An appeal was afterwards given to the Governor and executive council (sec. 56 of the Dig.), who were required and empowered to proceed to decide such caveats, in manner *and form as they should [*387 think most conducive to justice; and expressly declaring that from their decision there should be no appeal. And this was the existing law at the time the grant in question issued. By a subsequent statute (Dig. sec. 83) the power of hearing and determining such appeals, and signing grants, was vested in the Governor alone.

To permit an inquiry whether a warrant, obtained under such guards and checks, was authorized by law, would be opening the door to endless litigation, and against the spirit and policy of the land laws in general as well as the letter of the statute, which provides for caveats, and which declares the ultimate decision thereon to be final and conclusive. If the validity of the warrants cannot be called in question, the issue of the grant follows, as matter of course, and cannot be said to be without authority, unless the statute prohibits the issuing of a grant for more than one thousand acres of land.

The act relied upon on the part of the defendant, as containing such prohibition, is that of the 17th of February, 1783 (Dig. sec. 32), and is to be found in the proviso to the first section. The enacting clause relates entirely to head-rights, and declares that each master or head of a family shall be allowed, as his own head-right, and without any other or further charges than the office and surveying fees, two hundred acres; and shall also be permitted to purchase, at the rates therein specified, a further quantity, according to the number of head-rights in such family. *Provided the [*388 quantity of land granted and sold to any one person shall not exceed one thousand acres, and that such person do live on and cultivate a part of the said land twelve months, before he shall be entitled to a grant for the same.

The word "granted" is said to be used here in its technical sense, as synonymous with patent, and to imply a general prohibition to issue a grant to any one person for more than one thousand acres. Admitting this to be the sense in which the term is used, the consequence would not follow that is contended for. The term is here used in the proviso; the office of which is to limit and restrict the operation of the enacting clause. The enacting clause relates entirely to head-rights, and is without limitation as to quantity; that depended on the number of the family. The master or head of the family is allowed 200 acres as his own head-right, on paying office and surveying fees, and is permitted to purchase, at the rate therein mentioned, any further quantity, according to the number of head-rights in his family. The proviso, however, limits the quantity to one thousand acres; but the limitation is upon the subject-matter of the enacting clause, to wit. head-rights. The enacting clause speaks of two modes of acquiring these head-rights. One, a gratuity allowed to the head of the family:

the other, a purchase. And the words "granted" and "sold," as used in the proviso, may well be constructed in reference to these two modes of acquiring land. And the proviso is equivalent to saying that no one person shall be 389*] *allowed, on his own head-right, and on the purchase of head-rights in his family, more than one thousand acres. But this does not prohibit him from purchasing other warrants, and including all in one grant when it is issued.

That the word "granted," as here used, has reference to the warrant or incipient step towards acquiring the title, and not to the consummation of it by grant, is evident both from the subsequent part of the proviso, and from the use of the same word, as synonymous with warrant in other parts of the land laws. By the proviso, the person to whom land is granted and sold is required to live on, and cultivate a part of the said land twelve months, before he shall be entitled to a grant for the same. To give to the word "granted," in the former part of the sentence, the same meaning as to the word "grant" in the latter part, would involve gross inconsistency.

This construction is corroborated by the enacting clause in the third section of the same act, containing, substantially, a like provision, that every person applying by head-rights as aforesaid, shall, previous to his obtaining a grant for his land, or having it in his power to dispose of the same (otherwise than by will), settle and improve a part of such tract or tracts as he may obtain a warrant and survey of, etc.

And, in a subsequent act, passed the 23d of December, 1789 (Dig. sec. 85), the very word "granted" is used as the act of the land court, whose authority extended only to the issuing of warrants, and not grants. The enacting 390*] clause *gives to three or more justices of the peace, in their respective counties, the same powers that had been exercised by four justices and an assistant justice, under a former act; provided that the said three or more justices shall each of them sign all warrants for land by them granted.

Other parts of these land laws might be referred to, to show that this word is not always used in a technical sense as synonymous with patent. And that it is not so used in the proviso to the act of 1783, we think is very evident; and throughout all these laws, so far as we have been able to discover, whenever there is a limitation to one thousand acres, it is applicable to the warrant, and not to the grant.

It is clearly to be inferred, from various parts of these land laws, that warrants were transferable. Thus, in one of the earliest acts passed on the subject in the year 1777 (Dig. 261), it is provided that all persons who have had lands ordered them, and have not taken out grants for the same, or sold their warrants or rights, or are either dead, or left the state, such person or persons as have bought such warrants, or rights and titles, and continued in this state, shall have such lands granted them, agreeably to such order or warrant so purchased. And the prohibition afterwards, in the year 1794 (Dig. 280), to survey or renew transferred warrants, necessarily implies that, previous to that time, such transfers were sanctioned by the land laws; and if so, there could be no reason why a number of such *warrants should [*391 not be consolidated, and included under one grant, although the aggregate quantity might exceed one thousand acres. There might be very good reason for putting this limitation upon warrants for head-rights, as the settlement and improvement of the country might be thereby promoted.

That grants for more than one thousand acres were sanctioned, is evident from the act of the 23d of December, 1789 (exemplification produced), fixing the fees of the officers of the state; by which the Governor is allowed six dollars for signing a grant of land exceeding one thousand acres. So, also, in the act to revise and amend the above act, passed the 18th of December, 1792 (Dig. 173), the Governor is allowed, on all grants above one thousand acres, at and after the rate of two dollars for every thousand acres therein contained. Dig. 173.

Upon the whole, therefore, without pursuing this examination further, we are satisfied, that, in the year 1787, when the grant in question was issued, the land laws of Georgia did not prohibit the issuing of a patent to any one person for more than a thousand acres; and that the grant offered on the trial is not, therefore, void in law, and should have been admitted in evidence.

such acts in the courts of other states, and of the Union. No other formality is required than the annexation of the seal; and, in the absence of all contrary proof, it must be presumed to have been done by an officer having the custody thereof, and competent authority to do the act.

Under the crimes act of the 26th of March, 1804, c. 393 (XL.), s. 2, on an indictment for destroying a vessel with intent to prejudice the underwriters, it is sufficient to show the existence of an association actually carrying on the business of insurance, by whose known officers de facto the policy was executed, and to prejudice whom the vessel insured was destroyed; without proving the existence of a legal corporation authorized to insure, or a compliance on the part of such corporation with the terms of its charter, or the validity of the policy of insurance.

The terms "any person or persons" in the act, extend to corporations, and bodies politic, as well as to natural persons.

THE prisoner, John B. Amedy, was indicted in the Circuit Court of Virginia, under the 393*] act *of Congress of the 26th of March, 1804, c. 393 (XL.)[1] for destroying a vessel with intent to prejudice the underwriters, and after a verdict of guilty, his counsel moved the court for a new trial upon the following grounds:

1. That the exemplification of the acts of the legislature of the state of Massachusetts, incorporating the Boston Insurance Company (who were the underwriters), given at the trial, was not admissible in evidence as a sufficient verification thereof. The papers given in evidence were printed copies of the acts, with certain erasures and interlineations in writing, and to the copy of each act was annexed a separate attestation in the following words: "A true 394*] copy *attest, Edward D. Bangs, Secretary." The copies were attached together, and exemplified under the great seal of the state of Massachusetts, with the following certificate annexed: "Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Secretary's Department, November 12, 1825. I certify that the printed copies of the following acts, viz., 'An act to define the powers, duties, and restrictions of Insurance Companies' —'An act authorizing the several Insurance Companies in this commonwealth to insure against fire'—'An act to incorporate the Boston Insurance Company'—'An act to incorporate the Commonwealth Insurance Company'—and 'An act in addition to an act, entitled, An act to incorporate the Commonwealth Insurance Company;' to which printed copies this certificate is annexed, have been by me compared with the original acts on file in this office, and that the same are now true copies of the said original acts, except the usual attestation of enactment, and signatures subjoined to each act. In testimony whereof, I hereunto set my hand, and have affixed the seal of said commonwealth, the day and year above mentioned. (Signed.) Edward D. Bangs, Secretary of the Commonwealth."

2. That before the policy of insurance underwritten by the Boston Insurance Company could be given in evidence, it was necessary to prove that the subscription to the stock, and the payment of such subscription, as required by the act of incorporation, had actually been made. The policy of insurance was admitted *in evidence by the court below, with- [*395 out proof that the subscription to the stock had actually been made; it being proved that there was a company in Boston called the Boston Insurance Company, doing the business of insurance, and paying losses when incurred, and that the paper produced was executed after the manner in which they usually made their policies of insurance.

3. That the policy ought to have been proved to be executed by the authority of the company, in such manner as to be legally binding on them.

4. That the court instructed the jury "that it was not material whether the company was incorporated or not; and it was not material whether the policy were valid in law or not; that the prisoner's guilt did not depend upon the legal obligation of the policy, but upon the question whether he had wilfully and corruptly cast away the vessel, as charged in the indictment, with intent to injure the underwriters.

The judges of the court below having been divided in opinion upon the motion for a new trial, the case was brought before this court upon a certificate of that division.

Mr. Worthington, for the prisoner, argued that, in order to convict him of the offense charged in the indictment, it was necessary that the policy of insurance should be a valid contract. The intent with which an act is done is not susceptible of direct proof. The only means by which it can be established is by evidence of *facts from which it may be [*396 directly inferred. If the probable consequence of the act done is to produce the result from which the intent is inferred, the inference may be reasonable; but when, by no possibility, the result could occur, how can a fraudulent intent be inferred? If, in this case, the policy were valid, the probable consequence of the destruction of the vessel is a prejudice to the underwriters, from which might be fairly inferred, in the absence of explanatory testimony, a design to prejudice. But if the policy was void, no such consequence could possibly happen, and no inference can arise, from it alone, of a design to produce such a consequence. The strongest analogous cases are those of forgery, in which the distinction appears clearly to have been taken. In those cases it has been determined that where the probable consequence of the act was to defraud, the intent might be inferred. But where such was not the case, as

1.—Which provides (s. 2) "that if any person shall, on the high seas, wilfully and corruptly cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel of which he is owner in part or in whole, or in anywise direct or procure the same to be done with intent or design to prejudice any person or persons that hath underwritten, or shall underwrite, any policy or policies of insurance thereon, or of any merchant or merchants that shall load goods thereon, or of any other owner or owners of such ship or vessel, the person or persons offending therein, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony, and shall suffer death."

It is stated, in a note to the case of The United States v. Johns. 4 Dall. Rep. 412, that the second member of the above section is so inaccurately expressed, that the attorney of the district (Mr. Dallas) thought, at first, there must have been some error of the press; but the Secretary of States informed him that the printed copy was found, upon a comparison, to agree exactly with the roll. See the analogous English statutes, 4 Geo. I. c. 12, s. 3, and 11 Geo. I. c. 29; 1 Abbott on Shipp. 167, 168.

where the instrument was void on its face, and therefore could not deceive if ordinary vigilance was exerted, the intent could not be inferred.[1] Thus, where one Wall was indicted and convicted of the forgery of a will void under the statute of frauds, the conviction was held to be erroneous.[2] This question appears to have been 397*] decided in England in the case of the King v. Gillson.[3] In that case, the prisoner was indicted under the statute of 43 Geo. III. c. 58, s. 1, for feloniously setting fire to a house with intent to defraud the London Assurance Company. A policy was produced, regularly executed, covering goods in Wood street, on which was indorsed a memorandum stating that the goods were removed to Old Boswell Court, and that the removal was allowed. This memorandum was not stamped. The question arose, whether the written contract, being void by the revenue laws for want of a stamp, was properly admitted in evidence, and it was determined that the evidence was not admissible. In the case of The United States v. Johns,[4] this point was decided, and the court held that it was necessary to prove a valid policy. If, then, the validity of the policy is essential to the offense, it becomes necessary in this case to show a legally subsisting corporation, capable of executing a valid policy of insurance, and a policy legally executed. On the first point, it might be contended on the part of the prosecution that though it may be necessary to prove a party actually contracting, yet that proof of a corporation de facto would be sufficient. But it was insisted a corporation exists by its charter alone. It is that which controls its operations, and settles the mode and extent of its obligations. If the validity of the policy is necessary, it is surely essential to show that 398] the body which *executes it was legally empowered to do so, and that the act itself was performed in pursuance of those powers. This question was so decided in the case of The United States v. Johns. It was insisted that the papers given in evidence did not afford evidence of these facts because they were described in the certificate as printed papers, whereas they are partly written; and they were so loosely attached to the paper to which the seal is affixed as not to afford satisfactory evidence that they were the papers intended to be verified. If, however, the papers should be deemed sufficiently authenticated, still it is necessary, in order to show a valid policy, to exhibit evidence that the corporation went into operation according to the terms of its charter.[5] It was also insisted that a corporation was not a "person" within the meaning of the act of Congress. This point was raised in the case of The United States v. Johns, but not decided. It appears, however, to have been determined in England, in the case of The King v. Harrison.[6]

The Attorney-General, for the United States, argued that the evidence given of the acts of the legislature of Massachusetts incorporating the Boston Insurance Company, who were the underwriters intended to be prejudiced by the *felony, was sufficient under the act of [*399 Congress of the 26th of May, 1790, c. 38 (XL.), prescribing the manner in which the public acts. etc., of each state shall be authenticated so as to give them full faith and credit in every other state. All that the statute requires, in respect to legislative acts is, that the seal of the state should be affixed, and that obviates every objection which had been made to the exemplification in this case.

It was further contended that proof that the company actually carried on the business of insurance was sufficient, in a public criminal prosecution, without showing that they were legally authorized to transact it. It was immaterial whether there was a valid policy or not. The guilt of the act consists in the act itself, and the animus with which it was committed. It was analogous to the cases of forging a will, where the act was intended to defraud, not the party whose signature is forged, but third persons, and it turns out the testator was alive.[7] The guilt in such cases cannot depend upon the certainty that the party would have the benefit of the crime had his attempt been successful. In the case of The King v. Gillson the objection was not to the proof of the policy, but to the written indorsement or memorandum, which a particular statute had specially declared inadmissible in evidence unless stamped. It was, on its face, inadmissible, and the existence of the insurance *could [*400 not, therefore, be established. As to the requisition of proof that the conditions of the incorporating act had been complied with, it was a sufficient answer to say that the party was estopped from denying it, by receiving a policy executed by the company. To require proof of a valid contract would be to go into the whole case as a civil action, and would require an investigation of the whole law of insurance. Whether the term "person or persons," in a statute, includes such artificial persons as a corporation, had never been decided in this country. The supposed authority cited in the negative[8] was entitled to the less weight as it rested merely upon a MS. note of Mr. Justice Buller, was decided without argument, and is contrary to the analogy of the law which regards corporations as persons for all civil purposes. Lord Coke, in commenting on the statute 31 Eliz. ch. 7, concerning the erection of cottages, where the term used is, "no person shall," etc., says, "this extends as well to persons politic and incorporate as to natural persons whatsoever."[9] The other authorities are to the same purpose, and consider the term "persons" as including those artificial beings called corporations, as well as natural persons.[10] tions in the case it was important to consider the character of the offense created by the statute, and charged in the indictment.

In ordinary cases of crime, the act charged is, in itself, criminal; the intent to commit the offense is legally inferred from the act itself. In murder, the act of killing draws after it the legal inference of the malice prepense; in larceny, the act of taking the property of another proves the animus furandi, and so in other instances. The intent, or mental design is, in all these instances, proved by the act, and this intent is co-extensive with the act done. In the present case, however, the act done by the accused is innocent and legal in itself. He was the owner of the vessel—so charged in the indictment. In that character he might destroy his own property without being chargeable with any evil disposition or design. The simple act of destruction is, then, evidence of no criminality. Whence, then, does the criminality arise? From the intent to prejudice the underwriter. This intent is the hidden operation of the mind, legally to be inferred from certain facts positively proved. Those facts, which alone can warrant this inference, are, first, that such a person exists as the indictment charges that he designed to prejudice; second, that such person was in the situation which made such act likely to prove prejudicial. The first, therefore, requires that such a party should be in existence; the second, that his relation should be proved to subsist.

402*] *It is essential, then, that it should appear in proof that there was such a corporation as the Boston Insurance Company, because, unless such a party existed, the law cannot infer the design to prejudice it. It is equally essential that a valid policy of insurance should be proved, because, unless that party was placed in the situation in which it could be injured by the destruction of the vessel, it is impossible that such a design can be inferred.

These circumstances, then, are of the very essence of the crime charged, and must be established by plenary proof. How, then, is the existence of the corporation to be proved? In cases in which it is a plaintiff, it must also prove its existence; and this is to be done by the production of the charter, or the act of incorporation.[1] It cannot be pleaded in abatement by a defendant, sued by a corporation, that there is no such corporation, because, as that fact must be necessarily proved as part of the title, it is included in the general issue. In the case of The United States v. Johns,[2] (more fully, as to this point, reported in MS. statement of the case by Mr. Justice Washington), on an indictment under this act of Congress. proof of the act of incorporation was required and produced.

That there should be a valid and subsisting policy is equally essential. Unless there was such a policy, covering the identical property, upon the very voyage in which the vessel was 403*] engaged, *covering such a risk, and known to the accused, the law cannot intend that he designed to prejudice the underwriter. The rule of law is, that if every fact laid in the indictment may be true, and yet the accused may be innocent of any offense, the indictment is defective.[3] If essential to lay it in the indictment, it is equally essential to establish it by testimony. Unless, therefore, it be proved that there was a valid policy, there could be no underwriter who could be injured. There might be a policy covering the vessel against capture by the enemy, against destruction by fire, upon a different voyage from that which the vessel was pursuing. Under such circumstances, the law would not infer the intention to prejudice the underwriter. The case of The King v. Gillson[4] appears decisive of this question, so far as its authority is recognized. And in the case of The United States v. Johns the court held it was essential to prove a valid subsisting policy.

As to the supposed analogous cases of forgery cited on the part of the prosecution, all cases of forgery necessarily imply that the instruments are in themselves invalid; that they are false in reality is of the essence of the crime, which consists in the representation of such void instruments to be valid, with intent to deceive somebody. Such deception is practiced upon third persons, not upon those whose names are forged. Were a man indicted for representing a forged *will to be a [*404 genuine one, with intent to defraud a person shown to be dead, or never to have been in rerum natura, it might bear upon the former point raised in this case. Upon this point they can have no bearing whatever. Unless the instrument charged to be forged is proved to be false, there can be no conviction for forgery. Unless, in this case, the policy is proved to be valid, we insist the same conclusion follows. The essence of that crime is the representation of a false instrument to be a genuine one; the gist of the offense here is, that a party was in such a predicament that he might be injured by the act of the prisoner, and consequently that the policy was a valid one. The deception in that case might be equally successful, and therefore equally injurious, whether the bill purported to be made by a dead man or by a living one, whether the person who purported to be the drawer of a bill of exchange was in existence or not; and therefore that circumstance could make no difference. In this case, no person could be injured unless there was a valid policy of insurance, and therefore the proof of such policy is essential. If it be essential that a valid policy should be proved (which, in itself, includes the proof of a legally subsisting corporation), in what manner, and by what species of evidence, is this to be made out? By producing the act of incorporation or charter. Was, then, the exemplification of the acts of the Massachusetts legislature, in this case, sufficient? The statute of Congress directs that the legislative acts of *the several states should be [*405 proved by the annexation of the great seal. But this provision was merely in affirmance of the common law, and was not designed to dispense with any of the rules of the common law. The seal of the state proves itself, and may also prove the truth of the certificate which it purports to sanction, but that certificate ought to show, in its terms, that it was affixed by some one having authority to affix it. These papers are evidently, from the face of them, torn from some printed book, full of erasures and interlineations not enumerated in the certificate. These printed papers are not connected directly with the seal. The seal is on a distinct piece of white paper, and by a single thread these pretended acts of the legislature are connected with that. Some essential parts are again connected with those through which the thread passes by wafers. Does the seal prove these? If a thread or wafer were now to be used to connect either, or any of these sheets, with a newspaper, it would be equally well authenticated. These acts are not fully given. They do not include the evidence of enactment, nor do they contain the attestation of those officers whose signatures are essential. These are constituent parts of every legislative act. They are all upon the original rolls. The evidence offered is, then, merely of extracts, or parts of the acts, not entire copies.

It is not only essential that the act should be exhibited, but it should also be proved that the company went into existence and continued to 406*] *subsist. The grant of the charter must be accepted by the voluntary consent of those whom it designed to incorporate, otherwise it will be void.[1] The corporation might also have become extinct; it may have been dissolved; the charter may have been forfeited.

As to the question whether a corporation is a person, within the meaning of the act of Congress, the case from Leach and East is the only case which has been referred to, in which the question has occurred in a criminal prosecution. It has been suggested that it is doubtful whether such a question was, in fact, decided. East states it positively. In the last edition of Leach the assertion is reiterated, and it is sanctioned by the last editor of Comyn's Digest, and other authorities.[2]

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question for consideration is, whether the evidence of the act of incorporation of the Boston Insurance Company, disclosed upon the record, was admissible as a sufficient verification thereof. It is matter of most serious regret that an exemplification so loose and irregular should have been permitted to have found its way into any court of justice. As it has, it is our duty to decide upon its 407*] legal sufficiency. It *is under the seal of the state, and verified by the signature of its secretary.

It is said that this is not enough, and that it ought to be shown that the secretary had authority to do such acts. This objection must be decided by an examination of the act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1790, prescribing the mode in which the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of each state shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other state. That act provides "that the acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto." No other or further formality is required; and the seal itself is supposed to import absolute verity. The annexation must, in the absence of all contrary evidence, always be presumed to be by a person having the custody thereof, and competent authority to do the act. We know, in point of fact, that the constitution of Massachusetts has declared "that the records of the commonwealth shall be kept in the office of the secretary." But our opinion proceeds upon the ground that the act of Congress requires no other authentication than the seal of the state.

The other objections to the exemplification are, that the acts are printed copies, with erasures and written interlineations, not so annexed as to afford perfect certainty that they are the identical copies to which the secretary's certificate was originally annexed. We think these objections cannot be maintained in point of law. *The copies must be pre- [*408 sumed to be the original copies, in the same state in which they were originally annexed. Any subsequent alteration or subtraction would be a public crime of high enormity; and the commission of a crime is not to be presumed. The certificate of the secretary, taken together, shows that he did not mean to state that the printed copies had not been varied by writing, so as to be true copies, for he adds the phrase, "they are now true copies of the original acts." The original print is still visible throughout, and the alterations in writing are mere verbal alterations, not in the slightest degree varying the sense or effect of any single clause in which they occur; and, to afford additional proof of identity, the secretary has on each copy annexed his own signature, with an attestation of its being a true copy. There is therefore no presumption, from the face of the papers, or otherwise, of any alteration or addition since the seal of the state was annexed. The annexation of the usual attestation of the enactment and signatures to the acts was not necessary. It is sufficient that their existence and time of legal enactment is shown.

Our opinion, therefore, upon this question is, that the papers were properly admitted in evidence.

The next question is, whether before the policy of insurance underwritten by the Boston Insurance Company could be given in evidence, it was necessary to prove that the subscription to the stock, and the payment of such subscription, *as required by the act of incor- [409 poration, had been made. In our opinion it was not. This is not the case where a suit is brought by the corporation to enforce its rights, where, if the fact of its legal existence is put in controversy upon the issue, the corporation may be called upon to establish its existence. The case of Henriquez and Van Moyses v. The Dutch West India Company, cited in 2 Lord Raym. 1535, as decided before Lord King, whatever may be its authority, was of that sort, and therefore carries with it an obvious distinction; nor is this the case of a quo warranto, where the government calls upon the company to establish its legal corporate powers and organization. The case here is of a public prosecution for a crime, where the corporation is no party, and is merely collaterally introduced as being intended to be prejudiced by the commission of the crime. Under such circumstances we think nothing more was necessary for the government to prove than that the company was de facto organized and acting as an insurance company and corporation. The very procurement of a policy by the prisoner, to be executed by the company, was of itself prima facie evidence for such a purpose. In cases of the murder of officers, it is not necessary to prove that they are officers by producing their commissions. It is sufficient to show that they act de facto as such. In cases of piracy, it has been held sufficient to establish the proprietary title to the ship by evidence of actual possession of the party claiming to be owner. These are 410] *analogous cases, and furnish strong illustrations of the general principle.

1.—4 Com. Dig. 468, note a, Am. ed.

2.—4 Com. Dig. note t. Russell on Crimes, 1495.

The same answer may be given to another objection, and that is, that the policy ought to have been proved to be executed by the authority of the company in such manner as to be binding on them. The actual execution of the policy by the known officers of the company de facto, is sufficient.

The next question arises upon the instruction of the court "that it was not material whether the company was incorporated or not; and it was not material whether the policy was valid in law or not; that the prisoner's guilt did not depend upon the legal obligation of the policy, but upon the question whether he had wilfully and corruptly cast away the vessel, as charged in the indictment, with intent to injure the actual underwriters." We think this opinion correct. The act of Congress of the 26th of March, 1801, ch. 40, on which this indictment is framed, declares "that if any person shall, on the high seas, wilfully and corruptly cast away, etc., any ship or vessel, of which he is owner, etc., with intent or design to prejudice any person or persons that hath underwritten, or shall underwrite, any policy or policies of insurance thereon, etc., the person or persons offending therein, etc., etc., shall suffer death. The law punishes the act when done with an intent to prejudice; it does not require that there should be an actual prejudice. The prejudice intended is to be to a person who has underwritten, or shall underwrite, a policy thereon, which, for aught the prisoner knows, 411*] *is valid; and does not prescribe that the policy should be valid, so that a recovery could be had thereon. It points to the intended prejudice of an underwriter de facto. The case of The King v. Gillson, 1 Taunt. Rep. 95; 2 Leach, 1007, did not turn upon this point. That was an indictment for maliciously setting fire to a house with intent to defraud the London Assurance Company of houses and goods from fire. It was necessary to prove that the household goods in the house had been actually insured for the prisoner by the company. A policy had been executed by the company on these goods, in another house, and subsequently, upon the removal of the prisoner to the house set on fire, a memorandum was indorsed on the policy, agreeing that the removal of the goods should be allowed. This memorandum was unstamped, and by statute was not admissible in evidence. Six judges against five held the evidence inadmissible, upon the ground that the prohibition was intended to be universal. The existence, therefore, of the insurance itself, could not be established. If there had been proof that the policy was executed, the question might have arisen, whether it was necessary further to prove its legal validity in all other respects. The argument at the bar, drawn from the known law as to forgeries, is, we think, pertinent. In those cases, when they depend on the common law, actual prejudice is not necessary to be proved; and of course the validity of the instrument is entirely waived.

*Another question, not raised in the [*412 court below, has been argued here, and upon which, as it is vital to the prosecution, we feel ourselves called upon to express an opinion. It is that a corporation is not a person within the meaning of the act of Congress. If there had been any settled course of decisions on this subject, in criminal cases, we should certainly, in a prosecution of this nature, yield to such a construction of the act. But there is no such course of decisions. The mischief intended to be reached by the statute is the same, whether it respects private or corporate persons. That corporations are, in law, for civil purposes, deemed persons is unquestionable. And the citation from 2 Inst. 736, establishes that they are so deemed within the purview of penal statutes. Lord Coke, there, in commenting on the statute of 31 Eliz. ch. 7, respecting the erection of cottages, where the word used is, "no person shall," etc., says, "this extends as well to persons politic and incorporate as to natural persons whatsoever." In the case of The King v. Harrison, 1 Leach, 180; 2 East's Pl. Cro. 927, 988, it may perhaps be matter of some doubt, whether the point was actually decided by the court. But if it was, it mainly rested upon a peculiarity of construction which grew out of the statute of 31 George II. ch. 22, s. 78, which professed to cure doubts of the meaning of these words in other antecedent statutes upon similar subjects, leaving that on which the indictment was framed untouched. Finding, therefore, no authority at common *law, which overthrows the doctrine of [*413 Lord Coke, we do not think that we are entitled to engraft any such constructive exception upon the text of the statute.

Upon the whole, it is to be certified to the Circuit Court of Virginia, that the decisions of that court, upon the points of law arising at the trial, were correctly decided.

Certificate.—This cause came on to be heard on the certificate of division of opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court, etc. On consideration whereof, it is adjudged by the court that it be certified to the said Circuit Court that the points of law ruled by the said Circuit Court at the trial of the cause, and upon which the same court, upon a motion for a new trial, were divided in opinion, were, in all respects correctly decided by the said court at the said trial.

WILLIAMS, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS, and COMPANY of THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, Defendants in Error.

Where there is a joint judgment against several defendants, and one only sues out the writ of error without joining the others, it is irregular; but if the others refuse to join in it, quære, whether the plaintiff may not have summons and severance.

IN this case in which Mr. Wright was for the 415*] *plaintiff in error, and Mr. Webster for the defendants:

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated that the writ of error must be dismissed, it having issued irregularly. The judgment in the Circuit Court of Ohio was a joint judgment, upon a joint action for money lent, against three defendants; and the writ of error was sued out by one of the defendants, in his own name only, without joining the others. The court was of opinion that the writ of error ought to have been in the name of the three; and if the others should refuse to join in it, that it would deserve consideration whether the present plaintiff might not have summons and severance.

BARNES et al. v. WILLIAMS.

Where, in a special verdict, the essential facts are not distinctly found by the jury, although there is sufficient evidence to establish them, this court will not render a judgment upon such an imperfect special verdict, but will remand the cause to the court below, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Wickliffe and *Mr. Talbot for the plaintiffs, and [*416 by Mr. White and Mr. Isaacks for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated that, upon inspecting the record, it had been discovered that the special verdict found in the case was too imperfect to enable the court to render a judgment upon it. The claim of the plaintiffs being founded upon a bequest of certain slaves, it was essential to a recovery at law that the assent of the executor to the legacy should be proved. Although in the opinion of the court there was sufficient evidence in the special verdict from which the jury might have found the fact, yet they have not found it, and the court could not, upon a special verdict, intend it. The special verdict was defective in stating the evidence of the fact instead of the fact itself. It was impossible, therefore, that a judgment could be pronounced for the plaintiff. So, as to the defendant's defense under the statute of limitations, the special verdict did not find any facts by which the court could ascertain at what time the right of action accrued. It was not stated that the plaintiff and defendant were ever resident in the same state at the same time. Although it was found that E. D. Barnes, one of the plaintiffs, came into the state of Tennessee after he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and more than three years before the suit was brought, yet it was not found that during any part of that time the defendant, Williams, was resident in that state. The case was, therefore, too imperfectly *stated to [*417 enable the court to decide the questions upon which the opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court were opposed, and the cause was remanded to that court, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

[Construction of Statute.]

THE UNITED STATES v. KELLY et al.

Although the crimes act of 1790, c. 36, (IX), s. 12, does not define the offense of endeavoring to make a revolt, it is competent for the court to give a judicial definition of it.

The offense consists in the endeavor of the crew of a vessel, or any one or more of them, to overthrow the legitimate authority of the commander, with intent to remove him from his command, or against his will to take possession of the vessel by assuming the goverment and navigation of her, or by transferring their obedience from the lawful commander to some other person.

HE defendants, Kelly and others, were indicted in the Circuit Court for the district of Pennsylvania, for that the defendants, on the 24th of December, 1824, being seamen on board a merchant vessel of the United States, called the Lancaster, on the high seas, feloniously endeavored to make a revolt in the said vessel, contrary to the act of Congress of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, (IX.) s. 12. The defendants were found guilty, and moved the 418*] court in arrest *of judgment, upon the ground "that the act of Congress does not define the offense of endeavoring to make a revolt, and that it was not competent to the court to give a judicial definition of a crime heretofore unknown." The opinions of the judges of the court below being divided upon this motion, the case was certified to this court for determination.

The cause was submitted without argument by the Attorney-General for the United States, no counsel appearing for the prisoners.

Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a certificate of a division of opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, upon the following point assigned by the defendants as a reason in arrest of judgment, viz., "that the act of Congress does not define the offense of endeavoring to make a revolt, and it is not competent to the court to give a judicial definition of an offense heretofore unknown."

This court is of opinion that although the act of Congress does not define this offense, it is nevertheless competent to the court to give a judicial definition of it. We think that the offense consists in the endeavor of the crew of a vessel, or any one or more of them, to overthrow the legitimate authority of her commander, with intent to remove him from his command, or against his will to take possession of 419*] *the vessel by assuming the government and navigation of her, or by transferring their obedience from the lawful commander to some other person.

[Construction of Statute.]

v.
TAPPAN et al.

The words "true value," in the 11th section of the duty act of the 20th of April, 1818, c. 361, mean the actual cost of the goods to the importer at the place from which they were imported, and not the current market value of the goods at such place.

If the collector, in fact, suspects that the goods are invoiced below the current market value thereof, at the place from which they were imported, but does not suspect that they were invoiced below the true and actual cost thereof to the importer, the collector has no right to direct an appraisement.

But, whenever, in the opinion of the collector, there is just ground to suspect that the invoice does not truly state the actual cost of the goods, he may direct the appraisement, and is not bound to disclose the grounds upon which he forms that opinion, whether it is formed from his knowledge or in formation of the current market price of the goods, or other circumstances affording grounds to suspect the invoice to be fraudulent.

THIS cause was argued by the Attorney-General and Mr. Blake for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Webster for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the court:

*This is an action of debt upon a [*420 duty bond, under the act of the 20th of April, 1818. Upon the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, the following questions arose:

1. Whether the words "true value" in the 11th section of the act of the 20th of April, 1818, meant the current market value of such goods at the place from which they were imported, or the true and actual cost thereof to the importer at such place.

2. Whether, if the collector did, in fact, suspect that the goods were invoiced below the current market value thereof, at the place from which they were imported, but did not suspect that they were invoiced below the true and actual cost thereof to the importer, the collector had a right to direct an appraisement.

3. Whether, if, in the opinion of the collector, there was just ground to suspect that the goods were invoiced below the current market value of the same, at the place from whence they were imported, then the said collector had a right to direct the same to be appraised in the manner prescribed in the 11th section of the before-mentioned act of Congress.

Upon which questions the judges of the Circuit Court were opposed in opinion, and they are brought up to this court for decision.

It seemed to be admitted on the argument at the bar that the answers to these questions will depend in a great measure, if not entirely, upon a more general inquiry with respect to the basis on which the ad valorem rate of duties is to be *estimated; whether up- [421 on the actual cost of the goods, or the current market value thereof, at the place from which they were imported. That, prior to the act of 1818, ad valorem duties were to be estimated upon the actual cost of the goods cannot admit of a doubt. In one of the earliest acts of Congress passed on this subject in the year 1789, 2 L. U. S. 22, this was assumed as the basis. The act declares that the ad valorem rates of duty upon goods, wares and merchandise, at the place of importation, shall be estimated by adding twenty per cent. to the actual cost thereof, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, and ten per cent. on the actual cost thereof, if imported from any other place or country; exclusive of charges. In the act passed but a few days before, 2 L. U. S. 5, after the enumeration of certain articles subject to an ad valorem duty, it is declared "that on all other goods, wares and merchandise, five per cent. on the value thereof at the time and place of importation" shall be laid. The word "value," as here used, cannot be understood in any other sense than the words "actual cost," in the act passed only twenty-seven days after. It would be unreasonable to suppose that, in the former act market value was established as the basis, and in the latter a new rule introduced under the terms "actual cost," with a view to any change of the basis. It is more reasonable to suppose that value and actual cost were intended to import the same meaning. And, in other parts 422] of the laws on this subject, where these terms are used in reference to the rule by which the duties are to be estimated, they are to be taken in the same sense, and to be understood as a varied mode of conveying the same idea. 2 L. U. S. 22; 3d vol. ed. 185. In the act of 1799, the same basis, actual cost, is expressly adopted as the rule by which ad valorem duties are to be estimated, 3 L. U. S. 193; and that such was the rule previous to the act of 1818 was not denied on the argument, as it certainly could not be with the least color of plausibility. And if this be so, there ought to be a very clear expression of the legislative will, before a rule which had governed the practice on this subject for nearly thirty years should be considered as abolished and a new one adopted. And we think the act of 1818, 6 L. U. S. 300, will not justify such a conclusion. If any parts of the act, when separately considered, would seem to warrant such a construction, the whole, when taken together, admits of no such interpretation, and would, indeed, be directly at variance with the fourth section of this act which, in terms, adopts the rule first laid down in the act of 1789, and which has been continued in all the subsequent laws, "that the ad valorem rates of duties, upon goods, wares and merchandise, shall be estimated by adding twenty per cent. to the actual cost thereof, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any island, port or place beyond the same, and ten per cent. on the actual cost thereof, if imported from any other place, etc. It has been 423] contended, however, on the *part of the United States, that, by the terms "true value," as used in several parts of the act of 1818, and particularly in the 11th section, it was intended to substitute the current market value instead of actual cost as the basis upon which ad valorem duties are to be estimated. The subject-matter of this section is, to provide for the detection of fraudulent invoices, and fix the rule by which the duties are to be estimated when the invoice price is below the actual cost. The law requires, 3 L. U. S. 437, that the invoices of all goods imported into the United States, and subject to an ad valorem duty, shall contain a true statement of the actual cost of such goods. And no entry of the goods can be made unless the original invoice is produced, and oath made that it contains a just and true account of the cost of such goods. 3 L. U. S. 172. And to enforce a compliance with these injunctions, by putting into the hands of the collectors more efficient means of detecting all evasions of the law, was one of the principal objects of this 11th section of the act of 1818. It requires the collector, whenever, in his opinion, there shall be just grounds to suspect that goods, subject to an ad valorem duty, had been invoiced below their true value, at the place from which they were imported, to have them appraised. This power is, to act upon a supposed case of fraud, attempted to be practiced on the government, by making out the invoice below the actual cost. The great object to which the attention of the collector is directed, is to ascertain *the [*424 cost, that being the basis on which the duties are to be estimated. And if the invoice is false, the proper inquiry to detect it is as to the market value of the goods, and to compare that with the invoice price. And for the purpose of ascertaining such market value, the collector is authorized to appoint appraisers, who are sworn to report, according to the best of their knowledge and belief, the true value of the goods when purchased, at the place from whence the same were imported. The appraisers have, however, no concern with the actual cost of the goods. Their duty is confined to the value thereof, at the place of importation. And the law has declared what shall be the effect of a variance between the value so reported, and the invoice price. A small difference will not draw after it any penalty. The appraised value must exceed the invoice price 25 per cent., or no addition to the ratio of duty is imposed. The appraised value is of necessity assumed as the price upon which the duties are to be estimated, where the difference between that and the invoice price is 25 per cent. In that case the invoice is deemed fraudulent and to be laid out of view; and of course no evidence of the cost of the goods. And the 12th section expressly declares that the appraised value, in such case, shall be considered the true value upon which the duty is to be estimated. Or, in other words, so far as respects the rule by which the duties are to be ascertained, the true value, as found by the appraisers, shall be deemed the actual *cost. [*425 Where the appraised value shall be less than the invoice value, the duty is to be charged on the invoice value, in the same manner as if no appraisement had been made.

So, also, in the oath required by the 5th section of this act, true value imports nothing more nor less than actual cost. Any other construction would place it out of the power of any man to take the oath, where the goods were purchased at a rate at all differing from the market price. The law requires the invoice to be made out according to the actual cost, and this to be sworn to; and if true value means anything else than actual cost, the oath could not be taken. This is not a separate and distinct oath from that which is required by the act of 1799, and which is to accompany the invoice. The act declares it to be, not an additional oath, but facts in addition to the oath now required by law, which addition is, that "the invoice produced by him exhibits the true value of such goods, wares or merchandise in their actual state of manufacture, at the place from which the same were imported." There can be but one invoice and one oath, and that invoice must be made out according to the actual cost, and it necessarily follows that true value imports the same thing under a varied mode of expression. If it was permitted to make out two invoices of the same goods, one according to the actual cost, and the other according to the market value, and distinct oaths annexed to each, it might remove the difficulty *suggested. But that is [*426 not allowable. And no statute ought to receive a construction that will render it nugatory, or which prescribes a rule utterly impracticable, without incurring the guilt of perjury. If then, the basis upon which ad valorem duties are to be estimated has not been changed by the act of 1818, from the actual cost to the market value of the goods at the place of importation, as we are satisfied it has not, the answer to the first question certified to this court will be, that the words "true value," in the 11th section of the act of 1818, import the same thing as actual cost.

And this, as was conceded on the argument, will dispose of the other questions, and require that they should be answered in the negative so far as, from the form in which they are propounded, they will admit of a direct answer.

In explanation, however, of this answer, it is proper to observe that the 11th section of the act to which the questions are pointed, is intended to clothe the collector with enlarged powers to guard against fraudulent invoices. Whenever, in his opinion, there shall be just grounds to suspect that the invoice does not truly state the actual cost of the goods, he may direct an appraisement. How, or by what means, that opinion is made up, no one has authority to inquire, or a right to control. Ordinarily, it will be found from his own knowledge, or the information he gets from others, of the market price of the goods, and if that should differ widely from the invoice prices, it will 427*] afford grounds for suspecting *the invoice to be fraudulent. For, as a general course of business, it is to be presumed that goods are purchased at the common market price. The authority of the collector to direct an appraisement is regulated, however, entirely by his own suspicion that the invoice is untrue, and does not state the actual cost of the goods as required by law. Whether this suspicion is well founded or not, is not matter of inquiry. So far as respects the authority of the collector to direct the appraisement, he is governed altogether by his own opinion of the grounds of suspicion. Whether these suspicions were well or ill founded, and the consequences resulting therefrom, will depend upon after inquiry before the appraisers and their decision thereupon. But the collector cannot be called upon to avow, or show the grounds upon which his suspicion rests. The law has vested him with an uncontrolled discretion on this subject, to be regulated and governed by his own opinion, of the sufficiency of the grounds on which he suspects the invoice to be below the true value or actual cost of the goods.

These answers must, accordingly, be certified to the Circuit Court, upon the questions submitted to this court.

Certificate.—This case came on to be heard on the certificate of the difference in opinion of the judges, etc. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, and directs it to be certified to the said Circuit Court, that the 428*] words "true *value," in the 11th section of the act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818, do mean the actual cost thereof to the importer at the place from which the same was imported: and that the second question, upon which the opinions of the said judges were opposed, viz., whether, if the collector did, in fact, suspect that the goods were invoiced below the current market value thereof, at the place from which they were imported, but did not suspect that they were invoiced below the true and actual cost thereof to the importer, the collector had a right to direct an appraisement, be answered in the negative; and do also direct it to be certified that the third question, on which the opinions of the said judges were opposed, viz., whether, if, in the opinion of the collector, there was just ground to suspect that the goods were invoiced below the current market value of the same, at the place from whence they were imported, then the said collector had a right to direct the same to be appraised in the manner prescribed in the 11th section of the before mentioned act of Congress, be likewise answered negatively.

CHACE et al., Appellants,
v.
VASQUEZ, the Consul-General of Portugal, Respondent.

On a libel in personam for damages, if the court decrees that damages be recovered, and that commissioners be appointed to ascertain the amount thereof, no appeal will lie from such a decree until the commissioners have made their report; this not being a final decree.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Maryland.

The libel in this case was in personam against the owners of the private armed vessel La Fortuna, stated to be owned by American citizens, for the recovery of damages for the illegal seizure, etc., of the Portuguese ship Monte Alegre and cargo, which, by a previous decree of the court, had been restored to the libelants, no damages having been claimed in the libel in rem.[1] A decree pro forma was taken for the libelants in the Circuit Court, and commissioners were ordered to be appointed to assess the damages; but the appeal was taken before the commissioners were appointed, upon the ground that no libel could be sustained in personam in such cases.

*Mr. D. Hoffman, for the respondent, [*430 stated that the appeal might be considered as well taken. The case of The Palmyra,[2] was distinguishable from this, as the damages there claimed were a part only of an entire decree in rem and in personam; but that here the sole inquiry is, whether any libel in personam could be sustained, which was an objection that covered the whole libel, and the entire decree; that, although the report of the commissioners, when made, might be appealed from, yet the inquiry was only as to the amount; and that if no libel could be sustained, an expensive and tedious investigation would be saved by first establishing the point that a libel in personam cannot be sustained in such cases.

The court were of opinion that the case was embraced by the principle decided in the case of The Palmyra, since an appeal would still lie from the damages when ascertained; but that, had the decree of the Circuit Court dismissed the libel, such decree would have been final.

Appeal dismissed.

MILLS, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS and COMPANY of THE BANK OF THE UNITED States, Defendants in Error.

No precise form of notice to the indorser of a promissory note is necessary; and it is not necessary to state, in the notice, who is the holder; nor will a mistake as to the date of the note vitiate the notice, if it conveys to the party a sufficient knowledge of the particular note which has been dishonored.

It is not necessary that the notice should contain a formal allegation that it was demanded at the place where payable. It is sufficient that it states the fact of non-payment of the note, and that the holder looks to the indorser for indemnity.

By the general law, demand of payment of a bill or note must be made on the third day of grace; but where a note is made for the purpose of being negotiated at a bank, whose custom is to demand payment and give notice on the fourth day, that custom forms a part of the law of the contract; and it is not necessary that a personal knowledge of the usage should be brought home to the indorser for that purpose.

The general rule of law, requiring proof of the title of the holders of a note, may be modified by a rule of court, dispensing with proof of the execution of the note, unless the party shall annex to his plea an affidavit that the note was not executed by him.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Wright for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Webster for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

432*] *This is a suit originally brought in the Circuit Court of Ohio, by the Bank of the United States, against A. G. Wood and George Ebert, doing business under the firm of Wood & Ebert, Alexander Adair, Horace Reed, and the plaintiff in error, Peter Mills. The declaration was for $3,600, money lent and advanced. During the pendency of the suit, Reed and Adair died. Mills filed a separate plea of non-assumpsit, upon which issue was joined; and upon the trial, the jury returned a verdict for the Bank of the United States for $4,641; upon which judgment was rendered in their favor. At the trial a bill of exceptions was taken by Mills, for the consideration of the matter of which the present writ of error has been brought to this court.
